The big business men think we have not provided enough, and the secretary of this delegation, for fear that the big business men might not have acumen enough to write a letter to a Member of Congess, says:

I am inclosing a suggestion for a letter to our Senators and Representatives.

Here is the letter. I have received a number just like it. It is intended to be addressed to us:

Knowing that you are interested in everything beneficial to the State of Illinois, and I being especially interested in waterway development, I take this means of urging the necessity of strenuous action on your part toward getting appropriations passed in the Senate, and Congress as originally recommended by United States Army engineers. I was appointed a delegate to the Rivers and Harbors Congress and have given this matter much thought, and consider it extremely unfortunate that Illinois claims were ignored to the extent of cutting off parts of appropriation that were so badly needed.

The people in our district are in sympathy with the original recommendations, and I personally would be greatly indebted if you would use your influence toward increasing instead of decreasing appropriations for waterways in Illinois.

The letter accompanying this form letter reads as follows:

JANUARY 9, 1915.

DEAR SIR: As secretary of the Illinois delegation to the 1914 National Rivers and Harbors Congress, I am instructed by the delegation to notify you that the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That each member of the Illinois delegation write each Senator and Representative from Illinois, urging him to use his best endeavor to have the Committee of Commerce of the United States Senate restore to the rivers and harbors bill of this session the amounts recommended for Illinois projects by the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress."

It is imperative that you, and others who have influence with our legislators, urge them to make every effort to restore to the rivers and harbors bill the amounts recommended by the Army engineers. Chicago harbors need every dollar recommended by the engineers, and any amount less than the original recommendations should not be thought of.

Each of the 132 delegates appointed by Gov. Dunne are being requested to write each Senator, as well as each Representative from their district, and I trust you will find time to give this matter your attention. I know you are busy, but busy men are the ones who do things, and your influence and the influence of the other delegates may force our lawmakers to give this matter the attention it deserves.

I am inclosing a suggestion for a letter to our Senators and Representatives, but expect, of course, that you will use your own language. A letter along this line has the indorsement of Mr. M. F. Rittenhouse, chairman of the Illinois delegation; Mr. T. Edward Wilder, Illinois vice president of the Rivers and Harbors Congress; Mr. E. J. Kelly, of the sanitary district; and others.

Please advise if we may expect your influence in our effort to restore the appropriation above mentioned, and oblige,

Yours, very truly,

JOHN J. COMMONS,
Secretary Illinois Delegation to the 1914 National Rivers and Harbors Congress.

This is the way the great business men act upon these propositions. [Applause.] They have a letter sent out, personal in character, to be sent to the Senator or Members of Congress, telling how much they know about the subject, when the man who sent it assumed that they did not know enough to write a letter about it. That is the way big business men handle these things. Thank Heaven, that is not the way Army engineers handle such propositions. They figure them out on their merits and not on personal solicitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, there was not a motion to strike out the paragraph. There was a motion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to strike out the last word, merely pro forma.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pascagoula and Leaf Rivers, Miss.: For maintenance, $18,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of calling attention to a statement made by the Army engineers in reference to commerce at this point, and which is characteristic of other items throughout the bill. The question is whether or not their judgment is to be accepted in reference to such items.

On Leaf River I notice that the commerce is 335,010 tons, according to the report of the engineers, of which timber and logs amount to 335,000 tons and the merchandise to 10 tons. I assume that that is a mill, or something like that, because that would probably be the case in a project of this character. Ten tons of miscellaneous commerce is significant.

But returning to the question of the Army engineers, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] states, and very properly, that it would be unwise to leave these questions to men who have a personal interest. Why, certainly. If the gentleman will let me take the letterhead from which he read a moment ago—the gentleman states that the letter has gone to the Clerk's desk, but I had a copy of it in my hand this morning—it is from the Portland cement headquarters, and the writer of the letter sends out in the name of the rivers and harbors congress, to these various people who are members of that congress, asking them to write to the gentleman from Illinois and other Members who are interested in the Illinois projects, telling them what to do. No; you would not put men of that character in charge of an enterprise of this kind, to pass upon these projects. Portland cement people and dredgers and contractors should be left out. The suggestion is that men of standing throughout the country, like members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, men of that kind ought to be qualified—high-class men who would not be subject to political pull. No one says that Goethals is not qualified. No one says that Hodges and Gaillard are not of the same type. I have met them all.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I have received these letters from men drawing as high as $50,000 a year salary.

Mr. FREAR. I presume so. Salary means nothing at all.

Mr. MANN. Abler men than anybody here.

Mr. FREAR. Assuming that they are abler than the gentleman from Illinois, who is one of the ablest to be found, any man who is interested or likely to be interested in a project ought not to be appointed in such a place. Men who draw more than $50,000 a year have been hammering the Interstate Commerce Commission for months. But men of that type, appointed by the President, selected for the purpose of determining some system of waterway improvements and passing upon these projects, would be highly capable and ought to be removed from political influences. Think of the condition read here the other day when I showed a report where the Army engineers had rejected a project three times, and then 11 Members of Congress, two of them Senators, went before the board and demanded that they change their opinions, and they changed them. They had rejected the project three times. I can not believe, Mr. Chairman, that all the good is in the Army engineers, nor do I believe they should be intrusted with this important work. When I see these constant changes in projects, these constant amendments of opinions, these constant increases in amounts to be appropriated, and when I see the character of the propositions presented with the engineers' approval I can not believe the engineers are infallible. In fact, I believe we will get no material relief from present conditions until we take all projects out of the hands of Army engineers.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman tell us whether he knows of any perfect man or any perfect body of men?

Mr. FREAR. No; I will concede that; and I will also concede that it is a very hard proposition for the members of your committee. I know that it is.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman also tell us, and will not the gentleman admit, that perhaps of all the men of the country who ought to know about engineering problems the Army engineers are the best equipped for that?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, yes; so far as carrying out engineering problems.

Mr. EDWARDS. Does not the gentleman think that impartial men who are fitted for this particular service will give it the most impartial consideration?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. And will the gentleman——

Mr. FREAR. I can not yield any more time. I want to answer the gentleman, and he keeps asking me more questions. I want to say in response that that is true, but, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] says, men who have had no personal experience in business, who have no qualifications for business, are not competent to handle these responsible duties and ought not to be set at the task of determining the commercial possibilities of any project.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I move to strike out the last word, just to ask one question of the gentleman, on the paragraph, and not on this general debate. Does not the gentleman in all candor believe it worth while to spend $6,000 a year on the Leaf River, which floats $2,000,000 of commerce?

Mr. FREAR. If it is simply for the benefit of a sawmill, and there is nothing except 10 tons outside of the timber and logs, I should say that the condition of Mattawan Creek is precisely on the same level. As to the policy of making an improvement for the purpose of benefiting a particular institution, I should disagree to that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. This is to float $2,000,000 worth of commerce.

Mr. FREAR. It is immaterial how much. It is a question of the purpose, whether public or private.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is a commerce that everybody is interested in. It matters not whether it is lumber, coal, or ore.

Mr. FREAR. Let me make my answer clear to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. If the gentleman will pardon me for a moment, it matters not what it is or to whom it belongs just so it enters into the commerce of the world. Now, all of this is for export. This goes to the sawmills down there, and you notice that the value is $8 a ton. The value of ordinary logs is $2 or $3 a ton. This value of $8 shows that much of the timber is sawed. Does not the gentleman think it is worth while to spend $6,000 a year to make that stream navigable in whatever way is necessary in order to get $2,000,000 of commerce out to the sea?

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman has asked a very fair question. Let me endeavor to answer it just as fairly. If it is for the benefit of one mill or two mills standing there, I should say no. I do not believe in appropriating public moneys for private concerns. If that is proper to be done, then I admit that the Government may make contributions to any individual or any particular interest.

Unless it is for the public welfare to be served by navigation at that particular point, I can not understand how we are justified in using the taxpayers' money, whether it is in Wisconsin, Arkansas, or Mississippi.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman does not say that there is anything in the record showing that there is only one sawmill here?

Mr. FREAR. No; I do not say that. It is the principle I am speaking of.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I am talking about this particular item. The gentleman does not think that this is an unfair appropriation?

Mr. FREAR. I should want more information about it. I have said that there are only 10 tons of merchandise, and all the rest are logs and timber, and apparently a sawmill is located there to be served by this appropriation.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. A good many sawmills.

Mr. FREAR. Well, I do not know about that, I am speaking about the principle, and the general benefit to be subserved.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to say that it is not the sawmills alone that are benefited, but the people who live along the river and own the timber and float it down are benefited, and because of these appropriations the river is made navigable so that these people are enabled to float their logs to the sawmills and to obtain a good price for their logs and timber. It is a great benefit to the people who live along the river.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

South Pass Channel, Mississippi River: For maintenance, $50,000.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

"Red River, La.: For maintenance from its mouth to Fulton, Ark., $100,000."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the difficulty and the almost impossibility of securing the passage of any amendment to this bill. I wish, however, to say in the beginning that I have nothing but the kindest feelings for every member on the Rivers and Harbors Committee. They are all personal friends of mine, and I would not say anything to detract from their work or reflect upon them in any way whatever. But in considering the proposition of rivers and harbors throughout the United States one of the most deserving rivers is that of Red River, La., Ark., Tex., and Okla. For 475 miles that river is not only navigable, but until the last two years, which I will give a reason for later, it has been navigated for more than 50 years. This is not a new project. Not one dollar is allowed for it in this bill. This river serves to regulate the freight rates for more than 1,000,000 people, running through the districts of five Members of Congress, each of which has a population of over 200,000. As I say, it is the distributing point up and down and regulates freight rates for the benefit of more than a million citizens of this country, and still not one dollar is provided for it in this appropriation bill.

There have been various projects adopted for this river; the last one was that of 1882. From that time to this there has never been an appropriation bill but that has provided for this river until the one of last year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to these facts. I ask the attention of every Member on the floor, including every member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I have not said what I have about the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors with the hope of getting a vote from any member of that committee, but I am speaking to the membership outside of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. There is not a river in Florida, with 30 projects, in Mississippi, with its vast projects, or in Alabama, with its number of projects—there is not one that has the merit that Red River has. While I say I do not expect a vote from a single member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, I do expect that the Committee of the Whole will heed what I say and grant this deserving relief.

Last year for the first time the committee left out the appropriation for Red River in Louisiana, Texas, Mississippi, and Arkansas. Immediately the schedule of rates for freights was fixed up by the various railroads running into the city of Shreveport, La. Shreveport is a city of 40,000 inhabitants. It ships 250,000 bales of cotton per annum under normal conditions, and $15,000,000 worth of timber was billed out of that city in 1907. The commerce on this river serves to keep the freight rates down for that city as well as numerous other towns and cities along the river. They have now been notified that the rate on cotton bagging and ties will be raised from 10 to 20 cents. They have not been authorized to raise the freights yet, but it is in contemplation. They have offered to do it, and will do it unless the cities along this river are to have the benefit of navigation. That is an increase of 100 per cent. You take all the various articles down the line and they have proposed to raise the freight rates from 100 per cent, 200 per cent, and 400 per cent. The last article that I see is salt, a necessary article in every home, and they propose to raise that from 10 cents to 40 cents, or 400 per cent. This is on an application to increase the rates and charges. In this particular list I do not see that of cotton, but there are several other commodities. The only contention, so far as I know, by the committee is that right at this particular time and last fall there were no boats plying the river, and the only reason for it so far as I know is the fact that the river is full of logs and snags. The fourth congressional district, which I have the honor to represent, is the largest lumber-producing district in the United States. The State of Washington is the first producer of lumber and the State of Louisiana the next, and the fourth congressional district—my district—is the largest producer of lumber of any congressional district. There are vast quantities of timber, various kinds of staves, lumber, logs, and things of that kind being shipped continuously, and in cases of overflow, where these logs have been cut near the banks of the river——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WATKINS. In cases of overflow these logs have been washed into the river, and their ends projecting up make navigation dangerous. The last steamboat which went down the river had the bottom of it knocked out, and she now lies tied up to the wharf in New Orleans waiting for these logs to be taken out. It is only because of this physical condition at this time that it is dangerous to use steamboats, and the river is now not being used. But the people are waiting now for the logs to be taken out, and they are now in communication with the steamboat lines for the purpose of inducing them to put a new line of steamboats in the river just as soon as the logs are removed, and this snag boat is now standing tied up to the banks of the river, I suppose, for want of appropriations. At the last session of Congress there was a small balance of appropriations which lapped over from the year before and that was used as a reason for not allowing the appropriation at the last session, but that would last but a very few months, even at that time, and it long since has been exhausted.

This is not a new project, and all I ask now is to have the Members vote upon the recommendation of the Board of Engineers. If we are to have a board of engineers by which we are to be governed, and if we are to have a criterion by which we are to go, then why not and why does not the committee in this instance go by the recommendation of the Board of Engineers for rivers and harbors? They recommend the expenditure of $100,000 for this year.

The Board of Engineers from year to year has recommended from $100,000 to $250,000, and the appropriations have been made as high as $250,000 for the entire Red River in all these different States, and the commerce upon that river has been enormous up to within the last recent years; but right at this time, as stated, the reason I have given is the reason why it is not used at this particular time.

I think that in a hasty manner I have covered the various propositions involved; and without referring to this lengthy protest of my constituents, who are indignant, who are outraged at the fact that the entire appropriation has been withdrawn from the bill, without filing it, I will submit it to the fair and equitable consideration of the House as to whether a river larger than the rivers in any of these other States, more important than the rivers of many other States, except the Mississippi River—whether this river should be entirely ignored and not one dollar of appropriation allowed for it simply and purely because the logs and snags and impediments in the river so completely obstruct navigation that it is dangerous to property and life to have it further navigated.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, these telegrams represent the leading cities and towns between the Arkansas line and the mouth of Red River. They speak the truth. I appeal to the Members of this House to treat Red River fairly. I submit that the river deserves the usual appropriation of $100,000 annually. It can not be denied that appropriations are recommended by the Rivers and Harbors Committee in this bill for rivers not one-tenth as important or as large, and rivers for which there can not be half the justifiable reason given for such appropriation as is presented by the records I herewith submit in behalf of Red River.

Red River, 1,200 miles long, drains one of the most fertile valleys in the world, and all that is needed to place upon it all the commerce necessary amply to satisfy the members of the Rivers and Harbors Committee is for a reasonable appropriation to be made to encourage the people to build up the traffic, which they are doing and are anxious to continue to do if they can receive reasonable encouragement from the Federal Government. By the removal of one sand bar the river would be navigable the year round as far north as Alexandria.

I sincerely hope that this amendment will be adopted, and that Red River will not be treated so wrongly and in a manner so unjustifiable by this committee.

I serve notice now upon the House that at an early date there will be presented a measure carrying into effect the report of Gen. Bixby for the purpose of creating a Red River commission to organize and systematize the improvement of Red River on a scale that I trust will meet the hearty indorsement of the Congress.

The enormous lumber interests, oil and other mineral deposits adjacent to this river, which find their only outlet through its course, make it imperative that this $100,000 be annually appropriated until the larger and more comprehensive plan of improving the river can be put into execution.

I again most earnestly appeal to the members of the committee to agree to this amendment.

The river has been so neglected that no report has been made of the commerce on the river since 1910, and none then on the timber and oil products of that great valley. As explained by the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee in defending the Florida rivers, the engineers have not had enough money to keep the river navigable.

The work on Red River by the Federal Government began in 1828, and has had continuous support from the Federal Government for maintenance except between 1841 and 1852 and 15 years after 1857, until the last Congress. The existing project, which is not complete, was begun in 1882 and has been continued until last year. Certainly you can not turn this amendment down on your usual excuse that it is a new project.

In his report to Congress for 1914 the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army says:

The amount that can be profitably expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, for the work of improvement and maintenance of Red River is $100,000.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman says the only excuse for not making the appropriation for this river is that the commerce has decreased on the river. If that is a good reason for discontinuing the appropriation, it would be so with reference to every inland river in this country, even the Mississippi and the Ohio.

Mr. ASWELL. It would.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And every other river.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Texas, I will say that the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors made the best possible answer to the criticism made against the Red River when he defended himself for appropriating large sums of money for rivers in Florida, even though their commerce had decreased 30 per cent.

Under leave to print, I insert the following:

The report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army for 1914, page 867, is as follows:

The existing project now provides for continuing improvement from Fulton, Ark., to the Atchafalaya River, La., by the systematic clearing of the banks to remove the source of drift and snags; continuing snagging operations and the removal of jams and raft; dredging towheads and shoals; constructing a substantial system of levees to fix the course of the river, either alone or by cooperating with riparian States; the closure of all outlets that deplete the river; the fixing of caving banks to confine the river to the selected channel; and the prevention of injuries to regimen by new cut-offs or outlets. The nature of the improvement is such that no estimate for its completion can be given. The estimated cost to maintain improvement is $100,000 a year, exclusive of extraordinary demands for new plant that will arise from time to time.

On pages 841–842, the following appears in the Chief of Engineers' Report for 1913:

The commerce reported for the 18 years ending June 30, 1907, ranging in quantity from 66,376 to 279,946 short tons per annum, with estimated values of from $1,506,500 to $9,185,000. The average for the 18 years was 123,244 short tons, valued at $4,359,900 To this should be added the commerce from Ouachita River, entering Red River at the mouth of Black River, the average of which was 178,070 short tons, valued at $6,229,560, making a total of 301,314 short tons, valued at $10,589,460.

Traffic in timber products has increased on the river, which alone affords an outlet for them.

The project has effected a reduction on freight rates on all commodities.

The amount estimated as a profitable expenditure in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915 ($100,000), is to be applied as follows: Care and renewal of plant, $25,000; maintenance by snagging and clearing, $50,000; improvement by dredging, $25,000.

On March 30, 1914, Maj. Frank M. Kerr, chief State engineer of Louisiana, writes as follows:

I have no hesitation in asserting, from many years' experience, that for a stream of its length and magnitude and importance there has never been a year, in all the long years of the past during which it has been under consideration, in which the Government appropriations for the improvement of Red River have ever been anything like adequate.

Except for raft removals, snagging operations in the main stream and in contiguous lake regions, the overhead expenses and cost of maintaining the plant necessary for this, extending over quite a period of time, spasmodic efforts to promote the proposed restoration of navigation, by way of the lake region, between Jefferson, Tex., and Shreveport, La., some little harbor work, now and then, here and there, and for a year or so, about the time of the organization of the Caddo, Bossier and Red River, Atchafalya and Bayou Boeuf Levee districts, when some small part of the levee work required under the then proposed projects for the Caddo and Bossier Levee districts was assumed by the National Government, no real, systematic, and comprehensive advance, due to inadequate Government appropriations by the National Government, has ever been possible on Red River.

The result is that Red River, from source to mouth, in spite of local effort here and there along its length, is at best still in an untamed and uncontrolled state.

In Louisiana more advance along this line has been rendered possible, because of the longer and somewhat more strenuous efforts put forth during the past 20 years or so by its riparian dwellers and property owners, the outlay, with little encouragement from the Government, reaching, at this date, within that period, with projects at present under way, upward of $5,000,000.

A world of corrective work, from the point of view of navigation, as well as for restraining floods, is therefore still required on Red River.

Red River, just like the Mississippi River, also suffers greatly from caving banks. This condition is intensified by its extreme tortuousness, cut-offs, steepness of slope, and, where so far confined, to the enlargement of section consequent.

Realizing to what a serious extent the interests of navigation, the preservation of its lines of public levee, and the protection from floods of its riparian lands were affected by this ever-recurring menace, one local district alone on Red River, the Caddo Levee district, in addition to extensive levee work, drainage work, and rectification of channel ways, has recently undertaken to treat the greater number of the most aggravated caving banks on Red River within its limits with bank-protection work.

With such a good example as that set by the Caddo Levee district, it would certainly appear reasonable that the National Government should not much longer fail to accord substantial recognition to at least this important factor in river control on Red River, with its far-reaching influence over improving navigation and flood prevention, as well as of the numerous other features connected with the development and preservation of Red River as a great waterway for Louisiana, and elsewhere throughout its course.

We need more appropriation for the continuance of traffic, as the open river traffic gives us very low freight rates, thereby placing the necessities of life where the people at large get the benefit. Urge larger appropriations, as appropriations have been too small to be of benefit.

We, the undersigned citizens of Campti, La., urge you to use your influence in Congress to obtain a fair appropriation for the improvement of Red River, as navigation is now conducted on the south end from Alexandria, La., and in our opinion it will be only a short while before navigation will be resumed on the north end. If same is not taken care of now, when navigation is resumed it will be very expensive to open said river for navigation.

We maintain traffic on Red River between New Orleans and Alexandria and all way landings by weekly trips of steamer Omaha. The stage of water would permit the removal of snags and sand bars between Alexandria and Black River and will permit traffic as far up as Alexandria the year round. There is no reason why the river should not be made navigable all the way to Shreveport. The thousands of people living along this stream, the next in importance to the Mississippi in the South, are badly in need of the transportation this river can be made to furnish.

We insist that appropriation be made. No care taken of river in so long that it has run wild, filled in from caving banks, become more crooked, and less susceptible to navigation. If river is straightened it would deepen itself, and we would have no trouble in restoring navigation. Thirty-six boats were once kept busy in Red River. With locks river would be navigable at all times. If this course was observed by the Government, it would largely protect the valley from inundation.

Hon. J. B. ASWELL, Washington, D. C.:

Traffic manager of chamber of commerce now in New Orleans for purpose of effecting an arrangement with barge line to enter Red River permanently. Chamber of commerce has acted as body with cooperation of city officials. We recognize the dire importance of navigation in Red River, and are going to spare no pains nor expense looking to this end. Shreveport is thoroughly alive to the opportunity and will not be found wanting.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, as has been stated by my colleagues from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS and Mr. ASWELL] this is not a new project. About 1913 the Chief of Engineers made a recommendation that the improvement of this river be made and made an estimate of something in excess of $6,000,000. That report was predicated upon the theory that the Federal Government would be assisted by localities and States, such as levee districts and the like, and acting upon that theory the various localities upon Red River have proceeded to tax themselves until within my State alone the people have paid out already in the last few years over $1,175,000. That does not, of course, include the appropriations and taxation made upon the people themselves above or north of Fulton, Ark., nor does it take into consideration the appropriations made by levee assessments south of Arkansas, and for many hundred miles in the State of Louisiana. Notwithstanding this is not a new project, being a continuing one, this committee does not bring in one red cent for Red River. Red River has a drainage area of 97,000 square miles, much more than many of the rivers combined in this bill which have received many million dollars in the past and several hundred thousand dollars of appropriations carried in this bill.

The Yazoo River alone, if comparison may be made, and I do not desire to make an invidious comparison, has a drainage area of only 13,850 square miles. The great Ohio River has 102,000 square miles of drainage area. Red River, as I said, has 97,000 square miles of drainage area. The length of Red River, I believe, is 1,300 miles, rising way down in New Mexico, flowing eastwardly, separating the States of Oklahoma and Texas, then taking a southeasterly course, going through the southwestern part of Arkansas, and emptying into the Mississippi River about 150 miles above the city of New Orleans. This is one of the greatest cotton countries in all the earth, raising a peculiar grade of cotton, the long-staple cotton. It grows in my district near Red River, and has a special quotation upon the Liverpool market, bringing a higher price than any other upland cotton grown in the world. Now, the length of Red River is about 1,300 miles, as stated, many hundred miles of which have been made navigable and have been navigated until the past two or three years, when the Congress failed and refused to make sufficient appropriations. In length it exceeds the combined length of the Savannah River; the St. Johns River, of Florida; the famous Tombigbee River, of Mississippi and Alabama; and the Sunflower River, in the State of Mississippi. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that notwithstanding the recommendation made by the Chief of Engineers to appropriate the sum total only of $380,000 for the first year, the amendment of my colleague [Mr. WATKINS] upon this occasion asking for only $100,000 is certainly reasonable. I do not stand here as an enemy of river appropriations—worthy appropriations. I think if I have made any reputation at all, and it is very small along any line, it has been as a promoter and as favoring meritorious river appropriations where they are needed.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS] says that the engineers are the ones who are the authority upon these matters. I shall not make any assaults upon the committee, who are my friends. I believe they have done the best they could, but I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the committee has not followed punctiliously or in a way at all uniformly the recommendations of the engineers. Those recommendations have been wholly disregarded in many States not represented by the committee. This last year when $20,000,000, a lump sum, was appropriated and left to be distributed by the War Department, the State of Arkansas received $440,000. Now, if in the distribution of last year by the War Department we received $440,000 upon meritorious projects, I submit, gentlemen, that the sum carried in this bill for Arkansas appropriations of $41,000, a good part of which Louisiana receives, is inadequate and wholly disproportionate. We have, as Mr. CARAWAY, my colleague from Arkansas, said in his speech the other day, more miles of navigable streams in Arkansas, counting the Mississippi River which borders the eastern side of our State, more navigable water in our State than any other State in the country. It receives the pittance of $41,000. I submit, gentlemen, that if I were acting wholly upon the theory that our State is not getting the proportionate part of the appropriation, I might then recur and puncture, so to speak, those items set forth in the bill which, in my opinion, are unmeritorious. Here is this great expanse of country—97,000 square miles of area—producing cotton, sugar cane, and a great quantity of commercial output——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that for the Committee on Rivers and Harbors I have not only the very highest esteem, but the highest opinion in every respect, and I dislike to get away from them on any part of this bill, the more so because I have listened here for hours and hours to criticisms of the committee on grounds that are not tenable. If they have committed a fault in this bill it is a fault by way of being too conservative and by way of being influenced by the "pork-barrel" cry that has been raised in sundry interested quarters as well as by sundry people who think they are speaking for the public good. There are those in this country interested in preventing the waterways from being made navigable. Great railroad interests seem to control many of the great daily newspapers, and it is the seemingly railroad-controlled papers that are week after week pouring into the ranks of this committee their charges of "pork-barrel" legislation. [Applause.] You can notice the papers loudest in their denunciation of almost any restraint upon railroads and most insistent on allowing the roads to increase their freight rates; these same papers without exception are denouncing this committee as a "pork-barrel" committee. I happen to know that in my State where we have no water competition or possibility of it there, the railroad rates were advanced to the very highest, which to my mind is a convincing reason why the railroads want no waterway improvement and why all their influences are against it. Railroad owners are human and if a waterway actual or potential cuts down their rates they don't want that waterway.

From this very town of Shreveport, on Red River, before it was left off of the river and harbor appropriation bill, they had—that is, the railroad had—a rate on cotton to New Orleans of 18¾ cents per 100 pounds, or maybe it was 19 cents, while we were paying for a less distance in Texas 55 cents per 100 pounds. This abandoned river is the great Red River. Running into the Mississippi, the father of waters, you have the Missouri on the west, the Ohio on the east, the Red River and the Arkansas on the west, and the Tennessee on the east, which, in the order as I have named them, are the great rivers of the greatest and most fertile valley of this continent, and they fit into the framework of the water system of the United States, which, when they are made navigable, will enable us to ship the products of the great valley down to the Gulf; and then by the intercoastal canal, when it is completed, there will be a perfect framework, by which one portion of our country can communicate by water with the other portions. And when we pass laws rightly prohibiting cutthroat competition by the railroads, we will have cheaper freight rates for the coarser commodities and for all slow freight.

Let me explain what I mean by cutthroat competition. There are railroads from St. Louis, from Memphis, from Cairo, to New Orleans and to the Gulf. The Mississippi River also runs from these cities to the Gulf. Now everybody knows that a good freight boat can carry a cargo of any kind of freight from and to any of these cities or the Gulf cheaper than the same cargo can be carried by rail—but the rail route can carry it quicker—consequently on the basis of fair and equal competition the river naturally and really would carry most of the nonperishable, slow, and bulk freight, while the roads would carry the more perishable and costly freight which demanded quick transportation. Left to fair competition, both river and roads would get a fair and just share of the freight. There would never be any congestion of freight in the railroad offices of these cities, and the Mississippi would be covered from St. Louis to its mouth with great vessels loaded with logs and lumber and cement and coal and cotton and hundreds of other commodities, while the roads would carry most of the high class and package freight. But the river is confined to its bed. It has no tentacles that can reach out into the country away from its banks except the railroads, and there are but few centers of commerce or points of origin of freight on its banks, and by refusing reasonable cooperation and accommodation with water transportation, making high rates from the interior to river points, and low rates from one river point to another river point, they can without lessening the aggregate amount of freight collected actually starve river navigation to death. All this they have done and will continue to do so long as our laws permit them. They levy the tribute of unjustly high rates on interior points in order to be able by unjustly low rates from river points to kill water transportation. Their selfish purpose is to secure the whole transportation of the United States for the roads, and then having destroyed all competition, to reap a rich harvest of an aggregate high rate for the whole. They have followed this practice wherever it was possible and wherever they have been allowed by law to do it. In this way they can lower their rates from St. Louis or Memphis or Shreveport below possible water rates, and I have actually seen railroads hauling saw logs down the bank of the Mississippi River. This is what I call the railroad cutthroat method of competition.

When we learn a little more we will get to the point where we can amend the laws so that the railroads can not make the Mississippi River dry, practically, as they have done in the past. I have been on that river when it was practically dry so far as freight was concerned. When we have a great system of waterways and our laws reformed so as to enable us to get the benefits of it, we will have a reduction in the general burden of freights borne by the people of this country. It is no wonder that when the great railroad systems, who want to monopolize all the freights of this country, see a chance to charge pork-barrelism against this committee, they are quick to do it. It is hard to see good men fall into the meshes of their arguments and join in their clamor without losing respect for their good sense. They come here and charge "pork barrel," and just appropriations are refused. It was not right to leave out of this bill the Red River or any other great project that so long has had the support of Congress.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. If I can get more time.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I will ask for it.

Mr. HARDY. Very well.

Mr. CALLAWAY. You say that the general burden of freight rates will be lessened on the backs of the people. Is it not a fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has just said that burden is not heavy enough on the backs of the people and have allowed the railroads to increase their rates 5 per cent?

Mr. HARDY. You have asked the question, and I will answer it.

Mr. Chairman, the freight rates of this country are from time to time regulated by our Interstate Commerce Commission. Undoubtedly, the aggregate of the freight rates must be enough to pay actual expenses of the railroads that carry the freight and give them a fair profit, but I say that if you will enable the waterways to carry the heavy freight and the slow freight, and very much of the bulk freight, there will not be so much freight for roads to carry, they will carry what they do carry at fair rates, and all water-bound freight will be carried at far less rates than the roads can carry it. What the railroads want to do is to monopolize all the freight. They want to carry every bit of it and my friend CALLAWAY'S course is helping them; and then they want such rates as will enable them to get high pay for carrying it all. Under the conditions I have described they can do this if we as lawmakers let them. We have made a beginning toward preventing this cutthroat method of the railroads, by our last laws on the subject, but we have not gone far enough. When we have advanced our great waterway system further toward completion, men like my friends from Texas and Wisconsin will see the light, and help us to give to waterways their just share of our freights at their cheaper rates and not be fooled into joining the railroads to oppose all waterway improvements. It has been said here to-day that the average freight rate per ton per mile in the United States is 7 mills. That is approximately true. But the average rate per ton per mile on my cotton and on yours is 4 cents, or about 44 mills, for the simple reason that in our country there are no competing waterways. These railroads went before our State railway commission and said that if they reduced the rate on cotton from 55 cents to 50 cents a hundred pounds it would bankrupt the roads. And yet those railroads while charging us 55 cents for 250 miles were voluntarily carrying cotton from Houston to New Orleans, 390 miles, but in competition with a waterway, at 12 cents a hundred pounds. They can figure! And they sometimes pull the wool over the eyes of commissions.

I say that when this country does its duty we will have a river and canal system like that of France, where you can carry a package by water from the southeastern corner of France to the northwestern without ever taking it off of the water. And when you get that system you will not have the railroads congested with freight which they can not carry. They will carry high-class freights and get high-class rates for it, and the cheaper freights will go by water and at lower rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I will say that I do not intend to do so. But I would like to inquire if the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana is still pending?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Can not we reach an agreement as to the time for debate?

Mr. HARDY. I suppose the chairman would like to have such an agreement. I have no objection.

Mr. MANN. We have had half an hour on it now.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] to control five minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, the gentleman from Texas to have five minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, where is this amendment supposed to be inserted?

The CHAIRMAN. To be inserted after line 11 on page 20.

Mr. WINGO. That will simply close the debate on this paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. Close the debate on this amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I want to appeal to this House in behalf of this amendment, and to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The great Ohio River has been a wonderful blessing to her people, because they still continue to use it. The great Mississippi River might be a wonderful blessing to the whole country, but by unfair means in our railroad-rate regulations it has been largely caused to be the same as a dry stream. The time will come when our country will get its waterways in better condition than they are now, when some of the blessings, such as were pointed out by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BARCHFELD] as having come to the city of Pittsburgh from water transportation, will come to us everywhere. It will come when our Congress will adopt a law under which the railroads can not use cutthroat methods to secure a monopoly of transportation and when a great portion of our transportation of commodities will be on our rivers. We are a pitiful exhibition of statesmanship if we let the thousands of miles of navigable rivers in our country run to the ocean without being laden with freight while the railroads monopolize transportation, part of which they ought not even to attempt to take.

Here is the Red River, that for a long time has helped those people along its borders cut down their freight rates to a reasonable amount, now made dry because the appropriations have been stopped. There is no more deserving stream among all our inland waters. It affects the State of Arkansas and the State of Texas and the State of Louisiana and parts of Oklahoma. It is a great river, second only to the Ohio, with its tributaries, running into the Mississippi River; and yet for some reason the railroads were permitted by cutthroat methods to reduce their rates at Shreveport and other river towns while raising them at inland points till they killed transportation on this river, and we now second the operations of the railroads and cut off appropriations entirely, allow the river to fill with snags, and are apparently going to do nothing more till traffic resumes on the river.

Mr. Chairman, I do hope that this cry of "pork barrel," raised here and by the great newspapers of the country, will not deter us from doing our duty. We have a duty to perform to the whole people. I would like to have it known what are the interests that are fighting river and harbor appropriations. They are the great interests back of great newspapers that fight it every year, and it is the railroads that want to monopolize freights and raise their rates at every opportunity.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HARDY. Just one moment. I think I can anticipate the gentleman's question and thus save time. I know that Members here who are fighting different items in this bill have nothing in the world to do with these influences. I intended to say that. I have as high a regard for my friend CALLAWAY and for the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] as I have for any Member, but I do say sometimes it behooves us to look well to the company we are in, and when we find that we are fighting shoulder to shoulder with the great selfish interests of this country the significance of the fact ought to be patent to us. We ought to want to know why the railroads are fighting. They are fighting river and harbor appropriations because they want a monopoly of all freight, common and fine, carload and package, every kind. They do not want the waterways to carry an ounce or a pound or a ton of freight if they can help it.

They know that every waterway decreases their power to tax the people, and that more and more this people will insist on the full, free use of cheap water transportation. I would like to see all our rivers made navigable, and then we shall have, like the backbone of a great whale, the Mississippi River coming down through the center of this country, its ribs running out in the Red River, the Arkansas, the Ohio, the Tennessee, and the Missouri, and pouring the riches of its freights into the cities on its banks and into the Gulf of Mexico, and from there going back through our intercoastal canal around the coast of the Gulf and the Atlantic and up our streams into the interior, giving our people water rates by actual transportation and not by paper calculation and railroad differential rates only. I would like to see the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] agreed to by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I believe they ought to do it, and I believe the committee ought to put that appropriation of $100,000 on this bill and enact it into law. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am, of course, sorry that the committee could not see their way clear to incorporate this item of appropriation in the bill, but we were hedged about by limitations that are known and must be appreciated by all the Members of this House on both sides.

This particular item is for the Red River, which is a great river in many respects. There is now pending before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors a proposition to improve this river so as to make it a real commerce bearer, at a cost of several million dollars.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ASWELL. I merely wanted to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if he does not think it is imperative to continue this appropriation until that larger scheme can be put into effect, because it will require a long time?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Well, if the committee had thought that, of course, it would have been included. It is a great project, and if put into effect and executed it would make the Red River navigable. But in the opinion of the committee it is utterly impossible to restore navigation on the river by continuing the present project. We have expended nearly $3,000,000 on it, and yet the commerce has almost disappeared.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Let me state the case first. Last year there were 26,000 tons of commerce on the river, and about 24,000 of that was lumber and sand and riprap that floated down the river.

Mr. ASWELL. Does that include the lumber product?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That included even the lumber product. That includes everything. There were on the river 2 gasoline boats of 42 tons, and 2 steamboats of 497 tons which carried 10 passengers.

Mr. ASWELL. That did not include the traffic below the mouth of the Black River, which is larger.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. This includes all the commercial statistics of the Red River, Louisiana and Arkansas, below Fulton, Ark. From there to the mouth, unregistered, there were two gasoline boats and four barges. Of the 20,000 tons of timber, 15,000 tons went down in rafts. So that the committee felt, under the limitations which, as I said, confronted it, we could not justify the appropriation of $100,000 for this river. We found that after the appropriation of all this money the commerce continued to decrease and finally practically disappeared. Year before last it was 44,000 tons; then it dropped to 26,000 tons. The steamboats can not navigate that river in the condition it is in, unfortunately, because they can not undertake the hazards. It is very shallow and full of logs, and if the logs are snagged out, as this present project proposes they shall be, the water in the pools simply runs out of the pool above, and we have the same shallow condition as before. It is utterly impossible, in the view of the committee, to make that channel navigable so that it may be made serviceable to the people under the existing project. For that reason the committee thought that the only wise thing to do—not in a spirit of unfriendliness to this project, and certainly not in a spirit of unfriendliness to the State, but the only thing that could be done in justice to the country—was to pass this over until we can take up and give proper consideration to a project that may be of real service.

Mr. HARDY. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Just excuse me for a moment, until I finish. I have only five minutes. The gentleman had 15 minutes; his side has had 25 minutes. I just want to make this brief reply. I know it is charged on the floor, and I know it is charged off the floor, with great vehemence in some cases off the floor, that I am unfair to the State of Louisiana——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas and Mr. WATKINS) there were—ayes 27, noes 64.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, to show that all of the money for river and harbor improvements is not squandered or misspent, and as proof of the great benefit that these appropriations can be to communities, let me read a bit in reference to matters that the committee has already acted upon. I read from a letter printed in the Waterbury American of January 14, 1915, from a person who is visiting in Tampa and St. Petersburg, Fla., after an absence of 15 years. He is not a booster for a river and harbor appropriation. He tells interestingly of changes due in great part to improvements made as a result of river and harbor appropriations:

The sail across Tampa Bay was beautifully restful after 36 hours on a sleeper. Hillsboro River has been dredged since my last visit, so that now the boats, including some fair-sized sea goers come up into the heart of Tampa. Formerly Port Tampa, far down the peninsula which divided the big Tampa Bay proper on the west from the smaller Hillsboro Bay, was the shipping point for all but very small craft. It was reached by railroad and is, of course, still a busy spot. But our sea trip was about twice as long as the old one—two hours by schedule.

St. Petersburg is my most serious shock thus far. I remember it 15 years ago rather hazily as a slumberous little village, with a rickety wharf, a street of a few ramshackle wooden or brick structures, and a tiny terminal railroad station, from which one train a day arrived and departed from and to Jax, and two little yellow trains, with wood-burning engines, arrived and departed from and to Tarpon Springs, at the head of the peninsula. Yesterday we dropped into a city of paved streets, big buildings, trolley cars clanging in every direction, automobiles blocking traffic.

The old town seems to have been completely wiped out and built over. Central Avenue runs up from the old or Atlantic Coast Line wharf through the middle of the town. The streets are numbered from the water front westward. There are, I think, 15 or 16 of them in the developed area.

All streets, so far as we have seen, are brick paved, running, I should say, from 30 feet upward in width. On each side is a grass plot 15 or 20 feet wide; then a broad, concrete sidewalk and a narrower grass plot outside the property line. There are rows of palmettos which, with their short, thick boles and squatty verdure, give the same impression of formality that you get from boxed shrubs in a big city street. There is good water, sewers, gas, electricity, and fire alarm.

If one wants a temperate tropical climate, with every city convenience, he can not find a better place than this on the eastern coast of this continent, I should say. But it doesn't appeal to me. I still mourn my old, sleepy, enchanting St. Petersburg—this place ought to be "Petrograd"; it isn't St. Petersburg.

And why? Because judiciously spent appropriations by Congress have changed sleepy old St. Petersburg into a modern, up-to-date city. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Inland waterway from Mermentau River to Sabine River, La. and Tex.: For maintenance, $8,000.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

"Sabine River, La.: From Orange, Tex., to Logansport, La., $30,000, for construction of a snag boat and its operation for a period of one year in taking out logs; which logs are to be sold, the proceeds to go to pay expenses, in conformity with the recommendations of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, as per House Document No. 668, Sixty-third Congress, second session."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, this is a new project, and for that reason—and I conceive that is the only reason—the Rivers and Harbors Committee thought proper not to incorporate it into this bill. The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors made a very long report upon this proposition, recommending it favorably; and I want to state to the members of this committee that the estimates and the evidence on the hearing showed that there are approximately $500,000 worth of logs which can be taken out of this river and sold, making the river a navigable stream without costing the Government anything at all, except the $30,000 which it expends for the purpose of constructing this boat, and even that is to be paid back out of the proceeds of the sale of these logs. This is recommended by the Board of Engineers. It is a financial proposition which is a sound one. It will enhance the revenues of the Government to a large extent, and it is perfectly feasible in every respect. I ask for a vote, and hope to obtain the favorable action of the House on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WATKINS) there were—ayes 13, noes 37.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I had intended at this juncture to offer an amendment to insert a new paragraph, but I have decided not to do so, and I should like five minutes in which to explain why I have decided not to offer this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to strike out the last words, and is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I had in mind was an amendment which was reported to the Senate when the ill-fated river and harbor bill of 1914 was before that body. The amendment received the favorable action of the Commerce Committee of the Senate. It reads as follows:

Between lines 16 and 17 insert the following new paragraph:

"Improving waterway from Mississippi River to Bayou Teche, La., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 610, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $100,000, and in constructing said waterway the Secretary of War may use such portion or portions of any private canals as may be suitable for the purpose and can be acquired upon satisfactory terms."

I realize that this is a new project, although a great number of my constituents differ with me on that point. It is true it is a part of the intercoastal canal system on which a favorable report has been made, the system extending from St. Georges Sound to Brownsville; but that system is divided into a number of links and sections. Each section stands on its own bottom. Unfortunately, in spite of the fact that before the Senate committee Col. Beach, the engineer in charge, declared that this section from Morgan City to the Mississippi River was the most important segment of this system, still it was one of the last that was reported upon, and accordingly it stands before the House to-day as a project for which no appropriation has ever been made, and which has no further basis than a favorable report from the Chief Engineer of the United States Army Corps, a report never acted upon or approved by Congress. That, I understand, is the difference between a new and an old project, as determined by the committee and recognized by this House.

I believe then that as it is a new project and as I have been assured by members of the committee that no new project of any kind has been inserted in this bill, although there may be two or three that are skating on mighty thin ice—which I could mention if I cared to be personal—and as I am convinced that these gentlemen are acting in good faith and have sought to exclude all new projects, and as I remember the legislative "hold-up" that the rivers and harbors bill encountered in the Senate last year, and as I do not want to be responsible for defeating this legislation by overloading the bill, I think its passage can best be accomplished by standing behind the measure as the committee reported it, and I will not press the amendment at this time. I shall, however, insert certain resolutions adopted by various organizations in Louisiana and Texas, in which they pay their compliments to Congress and myself for the views that this House and I entertain on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the matter referred to:

Resolution adopted by the inland waterway committee of the New Orleans Association of Commerce, in session, Monday, December 28, 1914.

Resolved by the inland waterway committee of the New Orleans Association of Commerce, That the exclusion from the pending rivers and harbors bill of the New Orleans-Morgan City and Sabine-Galveston links of the Mississippi-Rio Grande Intercoastal Canal on the ground that these links are new projects is contradictory to the essential requisites to be considered in the construction or improvement of inland waterways, inasmuch as the Mississippi-Rio Grande Intercoastal Canal is one project, approved as such by the United States Engineers and to be worth while and to justify the investment already made, and its consideration under the head of interstate commerce, it must be so completed; be it further

Resolved, That we do hereby instruct our delegate (Mr. S. B. Stewart) to the meeting of the executive committee of the Interstate Inland Waterway League, to be held at Houston, Tex., December 30, to urge upon that meeting that it demand of the delegations in Congress from Louisiana and Texas that they insist upon the inclusion of these two links in the single project of the Mississippi-Rio Grande Intercoastal Canal in the pending rivers and harbors bill; be it further

Resolved, That our delegate be instructed to set forth the judgment of this committee before the executive committee meeting to the effect that the exclusion of these links in this unit project from the Mississippi to the Rio Grande is violative of every fundamental of business administration and tends to be destructive of the cause of inland waterway transportation in the region affected; be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the members of the Louisiana congressional delegation and the newspapers of the States of Louisiana and Texas.

NEW ORLEANS ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE,
B. B. MYLES,
Acting Chairman Inland Waterway Committee.

Attest:

M. B. TREZEVANT, General Manager.

The executive committee of the Interstate Inland Waterway League of Louisiana and Texas, and representatives of the various business interests of both States, at a special meeting held in Houston, Tex., this 30th day of December, resolve as follows:

We take issue with such members of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of Congress as declare that any section of the inland waterway of Texas and Louisiana, popularly known as the intercoastal canal, is a new project, and we call their attention to all reports in connection with this waterway which read "The inland waterway from the Rio Grande to the Mississippi River."

The presentation made by certain Congressmen who include the intercoastal canal with projects on the Atlantic seaboard, some of which exist only on paper and for which no surveys or appropriations have been made, is an injustice to the commercial interests of both States, which long ago secured recognition of the Mississippi-Rio Grande Canal as an independent project. We call upon the Senators from Texas and Louisiana to demand that the following amendments be made to the rivers and harbors bill:

First. Appropriation for the New Orleans-Morgan City section of the canal on a tide-level plan, with a minimum depth of 9 feet.

Second. Provision for the Sabine-Galveston section of the inland waterway along such approved route as will secure a minimum depth of 9 feet on tide level. In the event that the existing survey is not along lines where such depth can be maintained, we demand that the amendment offered to the Commerce Committee of the Senate authorize such survey as will connect the important ports of Galveston, Houston, Beaumont, Port Arthur, Orange, Sabine, and the tributary rivers in a 9-foot tide-level canal.

This meeting, representing the shippers and producers of the great commodities of the coast, viz, lumber, oil, rice, sulphur, salt, sugar, and various farm products, insists that the tonnage represented is entitled to immediate relief, which can only be afforded by a continuous waterway connecting all ports and tributary rivers of the coast; and it again urges its Representatives in Congress to take a positive stand for the amendments herein.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I take a great deal of delight in appearing here for a little matter that I want to present at the same time my friends and colleagues and relatives from Louisiana are on the scene. It is a great delight to me that my great grandmother was a Broussard, and therefore "Cousin BOB BROUSSARD" is the real name of the gentleman from Louisiana as he looks to me.

As I was returning to the last session of Congress I had called to my attention by a gentleman on the train a situation which I believe ought to be considered in connection with this bill. The rate of pig iron from Birmingham to Mobile, if intended for coastwise shipment to the Pacific coast, bears a rate of $2.75 per ton; if that same pig iron is intended for Cuba it bears a rate of $1 per ton to the identical port and over the identical railroad. It seems to me that that fact is proof positive that independent of waterways and independent of railways there is a rate discrimination at times that is absolutely inexplainable.

The idea that if we on the Pacific coast want to buy pig iron from Birmingham, in the home State of the able leader of the Democratic Party, for shipment to the Pacific coast we have to pay a rate of $2.75 per ton to the seaboard to aid the railroads put it over the steamships, whereas if Cuba wants to buy it she gets the same service for $1.75 per ton less. I think that if the river and harbor bill will cure that situation it will indeed be a valuable and precious document to us, for we need pig iron and iron piping and other such products on the Pacific coast and in Alaska.

But, gentlemen, I do not believe it can cure it. We of the Pacific coast, when we want that product, have gone to China and imported a vast amount of pig iron. We could go to the Birmingham district at the $1 rate to the seaboard. Ships are anxious to carry it through the Panama Canal. The same conditions prevail in regard to other commodities.

The rate is $2.75 per thousand pounds on this pipe if you take it for coastwise shipment to the Pacific coast, but $1.50 if you take it there to reship to Cuba. That is the situation that I wanted to take advantage of this opportunity to call attention of gentlemen, particularly the gentlemen from Gulf Coast States, the gentlemen from Alabama and Louisiana, and others, in the hope that this anomalous situation may be remedied. I ask, in connection with the matter, to insert in the RECORD some figures in connection with the rates, for the benefit of Members, and I do it with the hope of starting something, so that both Alabama and the Pacific coast will derive the benefit, in part at least, of the canal route.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the matter above referred to:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 18, 1914.

Hon. J. W. BRYAN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of the 9th instant, I am forwarding you herewith a statement prepared by our Division of Tariffs, showing rates, both domestic and export, from Birmingham, Ala., to Mobile, Ala., applying on pig iron, iron piping, lumber, cotton, and other principal commodities which are shown in tariffs filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. I have endeavored to have the statement prepared sufficiently in detail to cover fully your inquiry.

Respectfully,

G. B. McGINTY, Secretary.

(Inclosure.)

The following is a statement showing rates, both domestic and export, from Birmingham to Mobile, Ala., applying on pig iron, iron piping, lumber, cotton, and other principal commodities, which are shown in tariffs filed with the commission:

Commodity description.	Rates in cents.	Application.
Pig iron, carload.....	275 per 2,240 pounds.	Rate includes shipside delivery on coastwise movements by barges or sailing vessels from Mobile.
Do.....	100 per 2,240 pounds.	Export rate on traffic destined to foreign points and countries, including insular territories under jurisdiction of United States. Includes shipside delivery.
Cast-iron pipe, carload.	275 per 2,000 pounds.	Shown as local rate.
Do.....	150 per 2,000 pounds.	Export rate on traffic destined to foreign points and countries including insular territories under jurisdiction of United States. Includes shipside delivery.
Cotton.....	45 per 100 pounds...	Local rate.
Do.....	48 per 100 pounds...	Applies only as inland proportion of export rate on traffic destined to foreign destinations moving on through bills of lading. Includes shipside delivery.
Coal, carload.....	110 per 2,000 pounds.	Applies only when for bunkerage purposes other than for export. Includes cost of lowering from cars to barges or into vessels.
Do.....	100 per 2,000 pounds.	Applies when for movements by vessel to Galveston and other Gulf ports. Includes cost of lowering from cars to vessels.
Do.....	.....do.....	Applies to ship side for export to foreign countries.
Staves, carload.....	13 per 100 pounds...	For export. Includes ship-side delivery.
Tallow, carload.....	22 per 100 pounds...	Do.
Do.....	26 per 100 pounds...	Local sixth-class rate.
Bar and rod iron, carload.	10 per 100 pounds...	For export. Includes ship-side delivery.
Do.....	12 per 100 pounds...	Local rate.
Blooms, billets, muck bars, ingots, etc.	100 per 2,240 pounds.	For export. Includes ship-side delivery.
Do.....	275 per 2,240 pounds.	Local rate.
Lumber, rough or dressed.	9½ per 100 pounds..	Local or for export.
Lumber, surfaced, carload.	13 per 100 pounds...	For export only.
Machinery, carload..	19 per 100 pounds...	For export. Includes ship-side delivery
Machinery, harvesting, binder twine, farm wagons, and gasoline farm engines, carload.	26 per 100 pounds...	Local rate.

NOTE.—Alabama intrastate rates fixed by the Alabama State commission are not on file.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask the business men of Birmingham and the Gulf cities to take up this data and look into the facts and find out why such a situation should exist. One dollar per ton from Birmingham to Mobile if for reshipment to Cuba, but if for reshipment from Mobile to the Pacific coast $2.75 per ton from Birmingham to Mobile. What is the difference to the railroad what becomes of the pig iron after it reaches Mobile?

The Clerk read as follows:

Bayous Bartholomew, Macon, D'Arbonne, and Corney, and Boeuf and Tensas Rivers, La.: For maintenance, $10,000.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

Amend, on page 21, between lines 8 and 9, by inserting the following:

"The Caddo Levee Board is authorized to close Twelvemile Bayou and make a channel through Cross Bayou to Red River, all in Caddo Parish, La., in conformity with the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers and the approval of the Secretary of War, as per agreement of May 9, 1913."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I will ask that this agreement signed by the Assistant Secretary of War and a memorial from the board of commissioners from Caddo levee district be read in my time, and if I have any time left I will explain the matter. I will not ask the Clerk to read the contract, because it is a photograph and difficult to read, but let him read the memorial, and I will put the contract in the RECORD also.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to insert a contract and memorial in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The contract and memorial follow:

Whereas by section 10 of an act of Congress approved March 3, 1899, entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," it is provided that it shall not be lawful to build or commence the building of any wharf, pier, dolphin, boom, weir, breakwater, bulkhead, jetty, or other structures in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, canal, navigable river, or other water of the United States, outside established harbor lines, or where no harbor lines have been established, except on plans recommended by the Chief of Engineers and authorized by the Secretary of War; and it shall not be lawful to excavate or fill, or in any manner to alter or modify the course, location, condition, or capacity of any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, canal, lake, harbor of refuge, or inclosure within the limits of any breakwater, or of the channel of any navigable water of the United States, unless the work has been recommended by the Chief of Engineers and authorized by the Secretary of War prior to beginning the same;

And whereas application has been made to the Secretary of War by the board of commissioners of the Caddo levee district, Caddo Parish, La., for authority to close the mouth of Twelvemile Bayou, in the State of Louisiana, with a dike, at the point at which it now enters Red River, and to divert its waters through Cross Lake and Cross Bayou by way of "The Pass" and "Bonners Ditch" into Red River, at Shreveport, La., about 5 miles below the present mouth of Twelvemile Bayou, the plans for which have been recommended by the Chief of Engineers;

Now, therefore, this is to certify that the Secretary of War hereby authorizes the said work of closing the mouth of Twelvemile Bayou, La., with a dike, at the point at which said bayou now enters Red River, and diverting the waters of said bayou through Cross Lake and Cross Bayou by way of "The Pass" and "Bonners Ditch" into the Red River at Shreveport, La., about 5 miles below the present mouth of Twelvemile Bayou, all as shown on the attached map, upon the following conditions:

1. That it is to be understood that this authority does not give any property rights, either in real estate or material, or any exclusive privilege; and that it does not authorize any injury to private property or invasion of private rights or any infringement of State laws or regulations; nor does it obviate the necessity of obtaining State assent to the work authorized, as it merely expresses the assent of the Federal Government, so far as concerns the public rights of navigation. (See Cummings v. Chicago, 188 U. S., 410.)

2. That the work shall be subject to the supervision and approval of the Engineer officer of the United States Army in charge of the locality.

3. That if at any time in the future it shall be made to appear to the Secretary of War that the work causes unreasonable obstruction to the free navigation of said waters the grantee will be required, upon due notice from the Secretary of War, to remove or alter the same so as to render navigation through said waters reasonably free, easy, and unobstructed.

4. That there shall be installed and maintained on the work, by and at the expense of the grantee, such lights and signals as may be prescribed by the Bureau of Lighthouses, Department of Commerce and Labor.

5. That the location of the proposed closing dike shall be approximately as indicated on the attached map.

6. That the channel from Twelvemile Bayou to Red River shall be of such dimensions, and so located, that it will provide at least 4-foot navigation from Red River into Twelvemile Bayou when Red River is at a stage of 5 feet on the Shreveport gauge.

7. That the plans for the construction of the proposed diverting canal shall be submitted to and receive the approval of the Secretary of War prior to commencing operations under this permit.

8. That all bridges crossing this waterway between Twelvemile Bayou and Red River shall be so changed, at the expense of the grantee or other local interests, as to provide suitable passage for all boats using the waterway.

9. That the proposed channel or diverting canal shall be a free public waterway, subject to the Federal laws relating to such waters, and shall be subject to such modification by the United States at any time in the future as the interests of navigation may require.

10. That the mouth of Twelvemile Bayou shall not be closed until the channel between said bayou and Red River has been excavated and fully opened to navigation, and the bridges crossing it changed, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War.

11. That this permit shall expire by limitation if no advantage is taken thereof before December 31, 1916.

Witness my hand this 9th day of May, 1913.

HENRY BRECKINRIDGE,
Assistant Secretary of War.

MEMORIAL.

To the Congress of the United States:

The memorial of the board of commissioners of the Caddo levee district, a corporation and body politic created by act No. 74 of the acts of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana for the year 1892, with respect shows:

1. That said levee district comprises the alluvial portion of the territory forming the parish of Caddo; that these alluvial lands aggregate many thousands of acres of very rich and fertile lands, which were subject to overflow from the waters of Red River and its tributaries; that the system adopted by the State of Louisiana to reclaim its lowlands from floods is the levee and drainage system; that there is a general State tax levied for levee purposes, and this is supplemented by levee-district taxation; that the Caddo levee district is a levee-taxing district and its board of commissioners annually levies taxation upon the alluvial lands and upon the products of same for levee repair and construction purposes.

2. That with the means obtained from the State and from levee-district taxation and from the sale and lease of swamp and overflowed lands donated by the State to the levee district, a levee system, protecting the river lands and the lowlands back from the river, has been practically completed with one exception, and that exception is the channel of what is known as Twelvemile Bayou.

3. The line of levees coming down from the Arkansas line, north of the city of Shreveport, has been completed to Twelvemile Bayou, and has been completed from Twelvemile Bayou to Cross Bayou, which latter bayou is the north boundary of the municipal limits of Shreveport, and empties into Red River at Shreveport.

The hills of Caddo Parish touch the Red River and run along the river at Shreveport for about 2 miles, so that Shreveport is located on the hills. From the lower or southern boundary of Shreveport the levee system extends on down the river to the southern boundary line of Caddo Parish.

It thus apepars, and is the fact, that the levee system of the Caddo levee district is complete, except the one gap at Twelvemile Bayou.

4. At high-water stages of the river the water backs up the channel of Twelvemile Bayou and overflows and affects the drainage of many thousands of acres of alluvial lands, to protect which from floods was the purpose of the creation of the Caddo levee district.

5. Twelvemile Bayou is the lower link of the chain of bayous and lakes which form the navigable waterway from Jefferson, Tex., to the Red River. The other links in the chain are Soda Lake, the channel between Soda Lake and Caddo (or Ferry) Lake, Caddo Lake, and Buffalo Bayou.

6. Twelvemile Bayou flows into Red River 6 miles north of Shreveport. It formerly made its junction with Red River a short mile above the mouth of Cross Bayou, which latter bayou flows into Red River at Shreveport.

7. If the channel of Twelvemile Bayou, at or above its mouth, is permitted to be closed by dam constructed across it, the levee system of the Caddo levee district would be complete from the Arkansas line to the lower or southern boundary of the parish of Caddo.

8. But we do not ask that this dam be constructed across Twelvemile Bayou until a new navigable channel or waterway be constructed to take the place of that portion of the channel of Twelvemile Bayou which will be rendered unnavigable by the proposed dam, and in this connection your memorialists aver that the Caddo levee board proposes that Congress, in granting authority to close Twelvemile Bayou, make it conditional that this new chanel to take its place shall be first constructed under plans and specifications approved by the War Department; that the United States engineer officers in charge of the Red River and of the waterway to Jefferson, Tex., have already signified their approval of the proposed new channel.

9. That the proposed new channel would make out of Twelvemile Bayou at a point where there is already a natural outlet from that bayou, known as "the Pass," connecting the waters of Soda Lake and its outlet, Twelvemile Bayou, with Cross Lake; that this outlet or "pass" is also known locally as the Tim Mooring Slough, extending a distance of several miles from where it leaves Twelvemile Bayou to Cross Lake; that in the bed of lower Cross Lake this pass or slough encounters what is locally known as Bonners Ditch or Slough, which was originally a natural chanel draining part of the waters of Soda Lake and Cross Lake into Cross Bayou, which bayou is the sole drainage of the waters of Cross Lake into Red River; that Cross Bayou begins at the foot of Cross Lake and is formed by what is known as Bowmans Chute, Middle Bayou, and Bonners Slough; and that from where Cross Bayou begins, at the foot of Cross Lake, to its entrance into Red River at Shreveport its length is only about 2½ miles.

10. That the proposed new channel will utilize the Tim Moorings "Pass" or Slough, Bonners Slough, and Cross Bayou, thus bringing the waters, which now go down Twelvemile Bayou, into Red River just north of the city of Shreveport, making the mouth of Cross Bayou at Shreveport the outlet of those waters into Red River instead of the mouth of Twelvemile Bayou.

11. That the proposed new channel will shorten the distance which these waters have to travel to reach Red River very materially and greatly improve and facilitate the drainage of the country.

12. That the channels known as Tim Moorings Slough and Bonners Slough will have to be materially widened and deepened to make the proposed new channel equal to Twelvemile Bayou as a link in the navigable waterway to Jefferson, Tex., and this it is proposed to do; that Cross Bayou will require no dredging at all, it already having a deep and wide channel.

13. That the distance between the mouth of Cross Bayou and the present mouth of Twelvemile Bayou is, as already stated, 6 miles, and the State board of engineers of Louisiana estimate that by giving the waters of the lakes above Shreveport an outlet into Red River through Cross Bayou instead of through the present mouth of Twelvemile Bayou will make a difference of between 4 and 5 feet in favor of the better drainage of the lowlands, besides greatly facilitating the Caddo levee board in its work of flood protection.

The premises considered, your memorialists pray for favorable action by Congress on the resolution formally adopted by the board of commissioners of the Caddo levee district at its meeting on December 9, 1914, a copy of which resolution is hereto annexed and made part hereof. The relief wanted, as set forth in said resolution, is the permission of Congress to close Twelvemile Bayou by dam across it at some point below where the proposed new channel will make out of that bayou, but this closing of Twelvemile Bayou not to be accomplished until the new channel way is opened up to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War.

And your memorialists will ever pray, etc.

J. M. ZENTELL,
President Caddo Levee Board.
W. A. KIRBY,
Secretary Caddo Levee Board.

Excerpt from minutes of the meeting of Caddo levee board held December 9, 1914:

J. M. Robinson offered the following resolution, seconded by John Glassell:

"Be it resolved by the board of commissioners of the Caddo levee district, in session this, the 9th day of December, 1914, That Congressman WATKINS and Senators THORNTON and RANSDELL be, and are hereby, requested to prepare and have passed by Congress a bill formally authorizing the closing of Twelvemile Bayou and the opening in lieu thereof of a new channel or waterway through what is known as Tim Moorings Chute and its connections and Bonners Channel and Cross Bayou to Red River, just above the city of Shreveport, said new channel proposed to be opened to be of such dimensions as the War Department has approved or will approve, and to form a link in the navigable waterway from the city of Shreveport to the city of Jefferson in Texas.

"Resolved further, That this board attach to this resolution a memorial to Congress urging the passage of the bill above mentioned, and that the president of the board prepare such memorial, and, when prepared, the same to be attested by the president and secretary of the board and forwarded, with a copy of this resolution, to each Congressman WATKINS and Senators THORNTON and RANSDELL."

Carried.

A true copy.

W. A. KIRBY, Secretary.

Mr. SPARKMAN (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I have not heard the reading of the entire resolution, but so far as it goes it appears it has nothing to do with the question of navigation or the improvement of any navigable water. That I suspected when I made the point of order. If the Chair should sustain the point of order, it would make it unnecessary to finish the reading.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FLOOD of Virginia). This is a memorial that is being read. The gentleman reserved the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the Chair would sustain the point of order, it would make it unnecessary to continue the reading of the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserved the point, and the Clerk started to read the memorial in the time of the gentleman from Louisiana who desired it read in his time.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, when the memorial is finished I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk continued the reading of the memorial.

Mr. STAFFORD (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Florida has made the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. He has reserved the point of order.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The situation is this: An amendment was offered, and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] having the floor, asked that the memorial be read in his time, and he was recognized for that purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make this further question: When any Member, when a point of order has been reserved, makes the point of order that immediately terminates the time which any Member is using under a reservation of the point of order, does it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not keep count of the time the memorial has consumed The Chair rules that the gentleman has five minutes in which to have this read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that when the point of order is reserved and a gentleman proceeds to discuss the proposition on the merits that no Member is entitled to make the point of order in those five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to his five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And nobody else is entitled to demand the regular order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that nobody can take a Member off the floor until he has consumed his five minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think the five minutes have long since been consumed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is true. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, the memorial has been almost completed, and I ask unanimous consent that the memorial be put in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the memorial along with that which has been read be incorporated in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard now upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman upon the point of order.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors certainly could not have understood the purport of the resolution and memorial, else he would not have reserved or made the point of order. He did not know what was contained in the memorial. At most he could only have heard the amendment that was offered. The facts are that some four years ago Congress passed in the river and harbor appropriation bill a provision for a permanent dam to be constructed at the foot of Caddo Lake, which is a tributary of the Red River, cutting off the navigation between this branch of the Red River and the main body of the river. The Caddo levee board had been building levees on the river from the Arkansas line near the city of Shreveport, where there is an outlet of this closed stream running into the Red River, and when they got to that point they were allowed by this agreement between the Secretary of War and the Caddo levee board to close up Twelvemile Bayou, provided they would divert the channel through Cross Bayou, and the amendment calls for the allowance of that proposition, for the ratification of that proposition—to allow them to close Twelvemile Bayou and divert it, making a very much better navigable stream and at the same time reclaiming outright 45,000 acres of land and benefiting 95,000 acres of as fine alluvial soil as there is in the world. It is clearly a project for the benefit of navigation and, at the same time, for the purpose of reclaiming this large quantity of land and preventing the water from overflowing by the continuation of this levee across Twelvemile Bayou.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman had presented this proposition to me before I could have looked into it, but it comes up suddenly and no one has had any time to investigate it. I ask unanimous consent that it go over to be taken up again.

Mr. WATKINS. That is agreeable. I did not have time to present it, because I have just obtained it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that the matter go over temporarily for the present. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, do I understand this is a new project?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand that the policy of the chairman of the committee on this bill is not to include any new projects. What is the need of passing it over if the committee is not going to give consideration to new projects?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have not looked into it, and I want to see what it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Louisiana submits this as a new project.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana say it is a new project?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; it is a new project.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Then, we had just as well vote on it now if it is a new project.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. This is a reclamation project.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think it is a reclamation project, pure and simple, and I insist on the point of order; that will settle it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from Florida on the point of order.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It seems to me a reclamation project, pure and simple. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has no jurisdiction of reclamation projects, except as they flow incidentally from improvement of rivers and harbors. A few may flow incidentally from that; but this is a new proposition, an independent proposition, bearing mainly, if not exclusively and entirely, upon the subject of reclamation.

The CHAIRMAN. What does the gentleman from Louisiana say about this being a reclamation project?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I stated it was a reclamation project in that it directly reclaims 45,000 acres and benefits 95,000 acres, and to that extent it is a reclamation project; but at the same time it will benefit navigation. That is what the engineers report, and that is the contract entered into between the Government, through the Secretary of War, and the Board of Levy Commissioners of Caddo Parish.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is properly a reclamation project. At any rate, in the shape the amendment is, it is not in order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Galveston Channel, Tex.: Continuing improvement by construction of sea-wall extension in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1390, Sixty-second Congress, third session, subject to the conditions therein named, $200,000: Provided, That no part of the amount herein appropriated shall be expended and no contract shall be entered into under this appropriation until the county or city of Galveston and other local interests shall have donated the necessary lands to the United States, and shall have quieted all claims to the present San Jacinto Reservation, nor until the said county or city of Galveston shall have obtained a right of way and made provision in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War for paying the cost of constructing at least 3,300 feet of similar sea-wall extension in addition to that herein appropriated for: Provided further, That the entire work of construction shall be done under the direction of the Secretary of War, and the funds appropriated by Congress and those furnished by the county or city of Galveston shall be expended by him.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to this item on this account. We find that the project for building a sea wall in Galveston comes into the present river and harbor bill as a result of a report submitted to Congress by the Secretary of War on February 11, 1913, which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors on February 12, 1913. The river and harbor bill of 1913 became a law. Congress, as is well known, expired on March 4; consequently it is a very evident situation that very little attention could have been given at that time to the purport of the report in reference to this improvement. The improvement not only means the expenditure of this $200,000, which is the first item—and that is why I call it to the attention of the committee—but it is the beginning of a project which will involve, according to the report of the engineers, the country in the expenditure of $1,185,000 for a sea-wall extension, which I maintain has very little, if any, bearing on the subject of river and harbor improvement for navigation purposes. It can be argued, and will be argued by the distinguished member of the committee who is directly interested in this item, that it is solely to care for the harbor of Galveston. I dislike to disagree with the gentleman, but by reading the report, by reading the document itself, by reading the paragraph, by reading the similar paragraph in the bill of last year, it is just as evident as can be the real foundation for this effort to secure this $1,185,000 is to construct a sea wall, of which the city of Galveston is building a part, to make a nice promenade, having the Government expend a million and a quarter dollars upon that excellent local improvement for the benefit of the city of Galveston. Now, what is the excuse? The only possible excuse is that in 1900, more than 14 years ago, a great tidal wave struck the city of Galveston, and if another similar event may in the future take place it will flood this particular section where the sea wall ought now to be constructed.

For some reason or other the ordinary form of engineer's report was not sufficient to secure a favorable report on this project, so a special board was formed, which took up this project, and it says "that it believes in time of great storm this neck may be breached, resulting in serious damage to the Galveston Channel." Very good. But we are facing a financial condition now which it does not seem to me makes an emergency issue of the possibility of something again happening that may have happened or did happen 14 years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. If the city of San Francisco could, by some form of appropriation, secure immunity against a future earthquake, I have no doubt that it would be very glad to do so, and if the city of Galveston can likewise secure immunity against a tidal wave again hitting the city, it would be delighted to do so; but the building of this sea wall, making a beautiful promenade for the city of Galveston, will not bring that about. The report further says:

The situation, while satisfactory under normal conditions, is far from safe in the event of a repetition of a storm approaching in violence that of 1900.

As I have already said, that was more than 14 years ago. And then, again, in the draft as it passed last year it said all conditions must be similar to the part built by the city of Galveston. That is intended in this bill, and is also referred to in the report of the special commission, as follows:

The front part of the fill next the concrete should be protected by a sidewalk and brick paved roadway, as has been done in the Government's similar extension of the sea wall to and in front of Fort Crockett, and the top of the fill between this roadway and its rear crest should be protected from the blowing away of its material by suitable soil covering and vegetation.

We are going to build, at the expense of $1,185,000, as already estimated, a very attractive promenade for the citizens of Galveston, and we are going to fix it up nicely with a cement sidewalk and employ a landscape gardener, undoubtedly, and lay it out, and place trees and vegetation thereon. I submit that if that is any part of river and harbor navigation improvement, we can not ever rule out on a point of order any suggestion of any kind of an improvement that our good friends may see fit to bring in under the cloak of river and harbor navigation.

I am very sorry not to be able to agree on this point with the value of that expenditure for river and harbor improvement in the sum of $1,185,000, which my good colleagues on the committee think ought to be expended. But I want to caution the House that when we vote for this $200,000, as I know in all probability you will, because that is the way these suggestions are being taken—when you vote for $200,000 to-day you are starting the Government in a project which already the special committee says will cost $1,185,000. And in a year or two the engineers will come along again and say that we have got to change the project a little bit and have the sea wall a little more extensive, or say that the sidewalk needs a little more concrete in it, and the trees need to be a little bigger than they originally estimated, and so will raise the estimate $200,000 or $300,000. We are embarking on a very attractive improvement for the city of Galveston. If that is the kind of appropriation we are to have in river and harbor bills, let us adopt them with our eyes wide open.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Channel from Galveston Harbor to Texas City, Tex.: For maintenance, $50,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask to strike out the paragraph last read, being lines 8 and 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 22, strike out all of lines 8 and 9.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, there are a number of projects that we are approaching apart from the one that concerns Galveston proper, and in view of the fact that criticisms were indulged in a while ago against other States, and it was asserted that Texas had been neglected, I wish to call attention to the fact that already this Government has appropriated for rivers and harbors in Texas approximately $35,000,000. I have the items here, and can place them in the RECORD if you desire to have me do so.

Speaking more particularly to the item which has been read—of $50,000; channel from Galveston Harbor to Texas City—let me say that we have appropriated $2,035,000 on this project and that we had on hand $1,314,956 last October, in 1914, counting the money received in the sundry civil bill. This is an 8-mile project. And I call your attention to the fact that you are asked to appropriate $50,000 at this time in addition to $1,314,000.

In connection with this I desire to read from page 801, in reference to the commerce, which seems to be a legitimate and large commerce, but I desire to present this statement of the engineers, in which they say:

The effect of the project upon freight rates has been beneficial, owing to the establishment of a line of steamers from New York to Texas City, thereby breaking up the rate agreement that had existed between the old line between New York and Galveston. Prior to the establishment of this line in 1908 the rates by steamship lines from New York and seaboard territory to points in Texas were the highest figures that were ever in effect, notwithstanding the fact that the deepening of the Galveston Harbor channel had been continuously going on and that the depth was to 30 feet; but with a competing line in operation to Texas City the rates were reduced on the average of 51½ per cent, and the volume of the business increased over 300 per cent.

I would, Mr. Chairman, that I might stop there, but there is another small paragraph in which the engineer says:

However, during the past three years the rates have advanced again, the average being over 75 per cent over the rates of 1908.

Such is the State from which the gentleman [Mr. HARDY] comes, who a few moments ago said that the railroads must be driven out. You endeavored to do it by putting $2,000,000 into that harbor, and this is the result, notwithstanding the efforts of one of the best railroad commissions in the United States. In your own State of Texas you have that statement made by the Board of Engineers, indicating how futile it is to reduce freight rates by large expenditures of Government money at that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Channel to Port Bolivar, Tex.: For maintenance, $40,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, continuing along with several of those items, that seem to be increasing in character——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a motion?

Mr. FREAR. I move to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 22, by striking out lines 10 and 11.

Mr. FREAR. This is an appropriation of only $40,000, but the amount available here is $32,000, and in proportion to the total appropriation of $306,000 it seems rather large.

The project is for a 30-foot channel for 4 miles—the last was 8 miles—to Port Bolivar, which I understand has a population of 83 people. Of course there is probably a district surrounding that which has to be served. The amount expended to June 30, 1914, is $269,704. The channel is to be dredged up to the wharf of the Interstate Waterway Co. It was formerly only 9 feet deep up to that wharf.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to present a statement showing, after an expenditure of $306,000, the decrease in freight shipments during the past year. In 1912 the total freight at this point was 428,495 tons. This last year the freight has been reduced to 256,105 tons—a loss of 40 per cent.

And so, I say, Mr. Chairman, it would seem advisable in a case like this to make an inquiry before we appropriate $40,000 more, with $32,000 on hand, in the case of a project that has had only $306,000 in all these years, where there has been a loss of 40 per cent, and particularly in view of the fact that we have recently had placed upon the people of this country a war tax amounting to almost $100,000,000. I believe we should commence here.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Port Aransas, Tex.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $400,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I approach this with some hesitation, because a good friend of mine has an interest in connection with that. I want to make a motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a motion?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. I make a motion to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I recognize that quite a commerce has been served at this point; but if anyone will read the engineers' report he will be impressed with the fact that there has been a waste of money in experiments which call for an investigation to find out who is responsible for it.

We have expended on this project $3,253,000, and we had on hand last July $830,000, and we are calling for $400,000 in this item of the bill. We are getting into very large figures.

Let me suggest what the commerce amounts to. The commerce at this point is 211,330 tons, of which fuel oil is 193,922 tons, indicating the existence of several oil wells at that point.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; but first I desire to read something interesting here.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I wanted to interject a statement in there.

Mr. FREAR. Very well; go on.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement of my colleague from Texas [Mr. HARDY] that we should have water competition in order to bring the railroads to time, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this port, since they have got it all dug out at Government expense, complains that the railroads there are keeping them from having any commerce such as they should have, and I got a communication from Aransas a while ago looking to the taking of some action against the railroad companies and the ship companies, charging that the railroads would not haul it down there as they should haul it down there, and they wanted an investigation of that, to make the railroads bring the stuff down there, and then make the ships come and get it.

Mr. FREAR. I wish to read what Army Engineers have done for this project, reading from page 834 of the Engineers' report. To those who have stood for the competency under all circumstances of Army engineers it may be interesting to note the following:

Work was completed in accordance with the above-mentioned specifications June 11, 1906, at a cost to the Government of $546,703.10, but after the completion of the north jetty the channel became steadily worse, approaching dangerously near the jetty, and finally a secondary channel, 600 feet wide and 6 feet deep, broke through the gap between jetty and shore with the result that for all practical purposes the channel was on the north side of the jetty instead of the south side, as intended by the plan adopted by the Aransas Pass Harbor Co.

In other words, the Government engineers took up the project of the Aransas Pass people, a private corporation, carried it on to a conclusion with a loss to the Government of over $500,000, and then they have sought to lay the responsibility upon the Aransas Pass Co. for the mistake.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sabine Pass, Tex.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance of Sabine Pass and Port Arthur Canal, $500,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the two lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I realize that this is another very important project; but in view of the fact that we have appropriated $5,716,550 for it and that last October we had on hand $550,270 for further work, it occurs to me that this appropriation of a half million dollars at this time ought to be inquired into.

The total length of the canal from Port Arthur to Sabine River is 16 miles. The project is a 25-foot depth to Port Arthur. Up to this reading of the bill the appropriations that we have just been considering in Texas have reached for the various projects under construction $11,311,341, and in this bill approach nearly a million dollars. Reading from page 851 of the Engineer's Report—

On June 30, 1914, approximately 75 per cent of the dredging operations in the Port Arthur Ship Canal and turning basin had been completed, and approximately 13 per cent of the work contemplated in connection with the raising and repairing of the jetties.

The maximum draft that could be carried at mean low water in the Port Arthur Ship Canal on June 30, 1914, was 26 feet, with approximately 25.5 feet in the jetty channel.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, in view of the large amounts of money that we are liberally throwing away down on that water front—I do not care whether it is in Texas or Wisconsin—it seems to me we ought to have an inquiry as to the necessity from a public view. Why should we add a half million dollars in this bill, in view of the fact that we had on hand over half a million dollars two or three months ago to be used for the same purpose? Can we not practice economy here?

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I think this illustrates most beautifully the value of the criticisms which have been made against various items in this bill.

Port Arthur, which my friend talks about, is a self-made port. As almost every Member of this House knows, it was constructed by the citizens down there and donated to the Government. They have spent a million dollars of their own good money for this purpose. Having done that, they introduced a bill in Congress to have Port Arthur made a subport of entry, but Congress would not give them the pitiful privilege of being a subport of entry. That showed how much Congress thought about it. When they started to build this canal by private capital there was just a pittance of commerce that went through Sabine Pass. As late as 1899 there was a commerce of only 300,000 tons, of the value of $3,000,000. Yet that privately made port, a gift to the Government, is to-day, I believe, the tenth or eleventh greatest port in the United States, and it has an annual commerce of 4,000,000 tons, valued at $86,000,000.

The citizens in that locality from Port Arthur to Beaumont and Orange have put in private capital to improve that harbor, making it the best harbor in all the world, $1,900,000. Now, my friend moves to strike it out. Why? He says that some time last year, when the birds were nesting in the spring, they had some amount of money. The engineers have said that the commerce was so great that they could not make facilities fast enough to handle it. The fact is commerce is growing so rapidly that one firm doing business there spent $300,000 last year of their own private funds to provide facilities for handling the commerce. Adding that to the $1,900,000, you have over $2,000,000 that the local community has spent there.

The whole truth is, I know about that the same as some other men know about other things, and Members sit around and take the criticism in all verity, when in good truth I have no doubt much of the criticism is as utterly worthless as it is of this great harbor at Port Arthur. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Houston Ship Channel, Tex.: For maintenance, $250,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 16 and 17, on page 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 22, by striking out lines 16 and 17.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I realize that I have no chance to reply to the average defense, nor do I care to do so. I am willing to state facts from the engineers' report and leave the House to judge for itself, even though I vote alone.

Mr. Chairman, when we have a million dollars going into this project and $400,000 into another we are going a long ways toward reducing the Treasury balance.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. DIES. Does the gentleman realize that Texas is as big as the balance of the country?

Mr. FREAR. It is a great State, and let me say that you have done something that has not been done in many other places—you have contributed toward a number of projects and you are entitled to much credit for it. It has not been done in many other places.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman know that in the item he is criticizing the citizens contributed an equal amount to the Government contribution for the construction of the harbor?

Mr. FREAR. I believe they did.

Mr. GARNER. Now the gentleman wants to strike this appropriation out.

Mr. FREAR. But you have a lot of money down there now and do not need it, and as you have left the Treasury in bad condition, I am trying to help you economize. The engineer's report, page 806, says that the total amount expended on all projects at the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1914, is $5,375,590. He says we have $415,449 on hand now, and we are asked to appropriate $250,000 more.

The engineers give the commerce at 1,860,452 tons. Ordinarily I do not go into items to see what they are composed of, but here it says that 520,000 tons are sand and 750,000 tons are shells and 200,000 tons are floatable timber.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman is not talking about Port Arthur?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no; I was beaten on that project; we are up at Houston now. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], who thinks railroads are interested in this proposition. The report says:

The effect of this project on freight rates is unknown and is indeterminate, because of the railroad rate differential in favor of Houston, authorized by the Railroad Commission of the State of Texas.

The Texas commission is amply able to protect the people of that State from the railways, and all the waterways put together are of little service in that direction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, I greatly hoped that the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] would have exhausted himself in his futile and senseless fight against this bill before we had reached the item of $250,000 for the maintenance of the Houston Ship Channel. I am not given to much or frequent speaking in this House, but I beg leave to say that any man who will read the record, as the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin gives evidence of having done, at least casually, and then make a motion to strike out this item for the maintenance of this great project, shows, first, a total ignorance of the necessities of commerce, and, second, a total inability to appreciate a real port, and, third, a total lack of consideration for the commerce of the whole Southwest. The tone of the gentleman is most exalted; he seems to think that every item in this bill is what he is pleased to term "pork," unless it be those items that go to Wisconsin. His own streams and ports having been long since developed by the Federal Government, he goes into a state of frenzy when the Congress comes to develop other sections.

Almost every item of this great bill, carrying some $34,000,000, he ridicules, denounces, and slanders, and sets up his opinion against the Government engineers, the committee, 50 years of action by thousands of honorable Representatives and Senators, and the practically unanimous wish and judgment of this House. Truly, he must enjoy the isolation of his self-exaltation!

He even attacks the Houston Ship Channel, by moving to strike out an item of $250,000 for its maintenance. A mere glance at some of the facts will demonstrate the absurdity of his position.

In the year 1871 money was first appropriated for the beginning of a project resulting in the Houston Ship Channel. These appropriations were continued in 1877, in 1881, in 1892, and in 1899, all upon the reports of the engineers, and finally the present project was adopted on June 25, 1910. I should like in passing to say that the city of Houston proposed to Congress that for the completion of the project it would raise $1,250,000, contingent upon the Congress appropriating a like sum; and accordingly, on June 25, 1910, the sum of $1,250,000 was appropriated by Congress, and with that $2,500,000 thus raised the Houston Ship Channel was recently completed.

Mr. Chairman, I wish gentlemen would consider the following facts and figures and then by their votes on this item answer the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to cripple the Houston Ship Channel upon which the great sum of $5,375,590.94 has been spent. In the years mentioned below the number of short tons of freight, valued at the great amounts set opposite, passed through the Houston Ship Channel to and from the Gulf of Mexico, to wit:

Year.	Short tons.	Value.
1907	452,463	24,466,730
1909	1,214,904	36,097,560
1910	1,371,650	39,155,357
1911	1,354,897	34,721,530

Does that not satisfy the requirement that there be real traffic and increasing traffic to justify Federal appropriations? And now the people of that splendid city are preparing a commodious turning basin and terminal facilities in full accordance with the spirit and purpose of that noble enterprise.

In order to maintain the Houston Ship Channel, which is 50 miles in length from the Gulf of Mexico to the turning basin, $400,000 are required for suitable dredges, and the city of Houston has voluntarily raised $200,000 and tendered that sum to the Government, which has been met by a like sum from the Government; and now the gentleman from Wisconsin would have such total investment and commerce sacrificed rather than vote $250,000 for the maintenance of a channel bearing some $40,000,000 of commerce.

I can not think for one moment that the Congress will be niggardly, as the gentleman from Wisconsin would have it be, with the Houston Ship Channel, an enterprise whose conception was noble, whose development was inevitable, and whose possibilities are as limitless as the mighty future which spreads out before that people, that city, that State, and that great southwestern portion of our common country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Anahuac Channel, Trinity River, Oyster Creek, and Cedar, Chocolate, Turtle, Bastrop, Dickinson, Double, and East Bay Bayous: For maintenance, $25,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I certainly wish to extend my compliments to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] for the address with which he has favored us. As I stated yesterday, there are quite a number of Members in the House who are really indebted to me for giving them an opportunity to tell about the local surroundings in which they live. We are all pleased to hear them and to get their unprejudiced views. I have no desire to puncture what has been said by the gentleman from Texas in the slightest degree, but I just want to leave one thought: Of the 1,860,452 tons of freight of which he boasts, 1,470,000—or over 80 per cent of the whole—was sand, shells, and a little lumber, as I have before stated.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. DIES. As I understand, this project is just about to be completed; and does not the gentleman think it is a little unfair to talk about its tonnage within a few weeks after its completion and before the people have had a chance to use it?

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman misses the point entirely. I said that with $400,000 on hand at this time we ought to endeavor to economize in some small degree. Mr. Chairman, I wish to read now the following newspaper dispatch, which comes from Houston, Tex.:

INLAND WATER ROUTE TO TEXAS FROM MISSISSIPPI DEMANDED IN RESOLUTION.

HOUSTON, TEX., December 31.

Prospects of a continuous inland water route from all points on the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers to southeastern Texas and consequently continuous inland waterway connecting between Houston to the Great Lakes entered into the discussion of the special executive meeting of the Interstate Inland Waterways' League of Texas and Louisiana here to-day.

The meeting went on record as favoring a canal of 9-foot depth and 90 feet minimum bottom width connecting Galveston Bay and Sabine Pass, and a similar canal connecting Morgan City with New Orleans.

The resolution calls upon the Senators from Louisiana and Texas to demand that an amendment be made to the rivers and harbors bill so as to provide for the proposed canal extension.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] read not long ago a communication from his own State which demands of Illinois Members and Senators that they place back in this bill projects which were stricken out last year. These statements come from waterway associations—waterway lobbies. Are we not entitled to know, on the part of the House, who is demanding such action and why they are demanding it? This communication I have read comes from Houston, Tex., just handed to me, and I offer it as a fair sample of waterway demands. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Improving inland waterway on coast of Texas: For maintenance of the West Galveston Bay-Brazos River section, $15,000; for maintenance of the Brazos River-Matagorda Bay section, $30,000; for maintenance of the Aransas Pass-Pass Cavallo section, $45,000; for continuing improvement and for maintenance of Guadalupe River up to Victoria, $15,000; in all, $105,000: Provided, That any portion of the amount hereby appropriated for a given section of said waterway may, upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, be transferred by the Secretary of War and made available for maintenance of improvement in any other section.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to refer to several projects without asking to strike them out.

Mr. HENRY. I will ask the gentleman if he will not wait until after we read down to line 17 and pass that and then make his statement. That will give me an opportunity to fill my engagement.

Mr. FREAR. Certainly, if the chairman will permit a return to this. I will take no time of the committee except to state the facts showing the particular traffic upon these streams.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his pro forma amendment and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Brazos River, Tex.: Continuing improvement from Old Washington to Waco by the construction of locks and dams heretofore authorized, and commencing the construction of two additional locks and dams, $200,000; continuing improvement and for maintenance by open-channel work from Velasco to Old Washington, $10,000; in all, $210,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph in order that the matter may be formally before us.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, strike out the paragraph beginning with line 9 and ending with line 14.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Texas expresses a wish to speak, I am willing to yield the floor.

Mr. HENRY. Even if I have the five minutes in which to speak, I fear I will miss my train. I would prefer to have a vote without speaking.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will yield for the gentleman's five minutes first.

Mr. HENRY. I would rather not speak at all, but just vote on it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, with all due courtesy to the gentleman from Texas, I do not feel we ought to vote on this proposition without a word of explanation. I realize what the vote will be when we reach it, but at the same time I wish to extend the gentleman from Texas every courtesy, because I understand he has an important engagement to keep.

Mr. HENRY. I shall not insist. The gentleman can proceed with his speech.

Mr. TREADWAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, the item of the Brazos River is sufficiently well known, and it is not going to take a great deal of the time of the committee to show just a little what we are paying here for it. It is shown by the report of the Board of Engineers that there has been already expended on the improvement of the Brazos, appropriated to December 1, 1914, $2,316,250; that the amount needed to complete is indefinite; that no commerce has as yet developed. I think that of itself——

Mr. COOPER. No commerce?

Mr. TREADWAY. No commerce has yet developed on the Brazos River. That puts the proposition in a very concrete form as to whether or not we wish to continue spending good money and chase it after bad, letting the good money become just as bad in the end as that already spent is now.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman state how much commerce passed through the Panama Canal before it was finished?

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, well, we expect to get commerce through there, and we will never get any on the Brazos River. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi any comparison with the Panama Canal when he uses it to illustrate a stream that eventually is going to have some commerce on it; but if I can read figures right, if I can read these statements, if I can read the engineer's reports, the commerce that is going to be developed on the Brazos River is of a minimum amount, and the result would be just about as it is now after we have spent two and a quarter million dollars—"No commerce has as yet developed." When an indefinite sum is expended, which the engineers say will be needed to complete it as planned, then I prophesy the report can still come back here and be given in with all truth, "No commerce has as yet developed." And why? I hold in my hand the report of the engineer, which is made with all due consideration of the interest of the Brazos River and the people promoting it, and I quote:

It is obviously difficult to determine with absolute accuracy the number of months in which the minimum depth for water in navigation will prevail, primarily because the rainfall varies greatly from year to year, and secondarily, on account of the great expense of obtaining all the exact data for each reach of the river.

Then they have on the next page of the report a table showing the depth of water and its stages over a certain average number of days during the years 1903, 1904, and 1905, and we find that for 252 days of that period—the average number of days per year during that period—the average depth was 3 feet; for 184 days, 3½ feet; for 136 days, 4 feet; and for 88 days they actually got 5 feet of water.

Then, again, I see this item:

Experience with the shoals below Old Washington indicates that by dredging and contraction work a gain in depth over shoals of 2.6 feet can be readily made. The work is being done with that idea, and frequently depths of 3 feet and more result.

Is not that fine? Frequently there will be 3 feet of water!

It therefore seems that the proper answer to the proposition proposed by the act of Congress, upon which the appropriation of the $75,000 depends—

Do we not begin these big projects mighty modestly? The original project was $75,000—namely, the least number of locks and dams that will furnish navigation for four or six months, is eight, and that these eight will furnish a little over fourth months' average navigation.

And still my good friend and colleague on the committee wants to compare navigation on the Brazos River with the greatest engineering proposition ever undertaken by the United States, namely, the construction of the Panama Canal.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The fact is that there is just as much commerce on the Brazos River now as there was on the Panama Canal before it was completed.

Mr. TREADWAY. Did you vote for the completion of the Panama Canal in the expectation of securing the amount of water that the engineer's reports say the Brazos River will eventually get when the amount of money is spent which this report calls for?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, no——

Mr. TREADWAY. Then please do not draw a comparison between the two propositions.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I understand the gentleman naturally objects to the comparison.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not think it is in point, if I may be allowed to criticize the gentleman from Mississippi. I do not think his comparison carries with it any point whatsoever. The whole subject is right down in the engineers' report. I have quoted it once. It is in the RECORD with my remarks, on page 1633. I do not want to take the time of the committee or the time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] by reading it again, but it is perhaps just possible that we ought to call attention to a line or two here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman suggested that he did not intend to move to strike out this item. I have just one minute in which to meet that engagement.

Mr. MANN. Is it not worth more than that to the gentleman?

Mr. HENRY. If the gentleman puts it that way, I am willing to stay and talk about this matter to the committee. However, I am willing to vote now. I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I call for a division on this important question.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 8, noes 42.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the channels which the Beaumont navigation district, or other local interests, and the Orange navigation district, or other local interests, are required by the aforesaid act to maintain for a term of three years, free of cost to the United States, are hereby defined as, respectively, the channel from the mouth of the Neches River up to Beaumont, Tex., and the channel from the mouth of the Neches River up to Orange, Tex.: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as relieving said Beaumont navigation district of its obligation to provide for the operation and maintenance of the guard lock without cost to the United States as required by said river and harbor act of February 27, 1911.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. Will the gentleman give an explanation of what this is intended to do? Is this to relieve the Beaumont Navigation Co. or compel them to do something they are not now required to do?

Mr. DIES. I will try in a very brief moment to give the gentleman an explanation unless he cares to use some time.

Mr. MANN. No; I want information.

Mr. DIES. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that this project, in which the citizens of Beaumont and Orange participated to the extent of contributing half of the money, was recommended by a special board of engineers who visited the locality and held a hearing. The citizens submitted four plans to the Government, and the Government accepted plan No. 4. Now, having said that, let me say this other thing: This was for an improvement in the Neches River and the Sabine River, from the mouths of those rivers to the towns of Beaumont and Orange. It also provided for the deepening of the Sabine-Neches Canal, a waterway of about 10 miles, already existing, but it was only 10 feet in depth.

Mr. MANN. Possibly I could shorten what I want to get at by asking a question.

Mr. DIES. Very well.

Mr. MANN. Under the law the Beaumont Navigation Co. is required to maintain certain channels for a term of three years?

Mr. DIES. I am about to come to that.

Mr. MANN. Does this relieve the company from the maintenance of any of the channels it is now required to maintain?

Mr. DIES. It relieves them from the maintenance of no channel that they ever agreed to maintain. In this proposition, made by the Government, this language was used:

We further offer to pay the cost of the maintenance of the proposed improvement in the Neches River, including turning basin at Beaumont, for a period of three years after the completion of said improvement.

Now, then, that was embodied in Document No. 1290. The law that was enacted was as follows:

Improving the Sabine-Neches Canal, Tex., from the Port Arthur Ship Canal to the mouth of the Sabine River, the Neches River up to the town of Beaumont, and the Sabine River up to the town of Orange, to a navigable depth of 25 feet, in accordance with plan No. 4, submitted in House Document No. 1290, Sixty-first Congress, third session.

Now, it is true, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, that, notwithstanding the commissioner has not agreed to maintain anything except the river, the construction placed upon the law by the Board of Engineers was that they should not only maintain the river which was proposed to be improved, but should take over the maintenance of the already existing Government stream, to wit, the Sabine-Neches Canal. As soon as it came to my knowledge I went to the Board of Engineers and to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and laid the matter before them, because they had never agreed to maintain the channel except in the rivers; but that was the understanding, and it was so nominated in the bond—that is, in the offer and in the acceptance. And this is no more, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, than a correction of that mistake, which arose in that way.

Mr. MANN. It is not intended to relieve the company of any obligations which in the gentleman's opinion they ought to maintain?

Mr. DIES. No. They are still to maintain the channel in the Sabine River and in the Neches River. They are not to take over the maintenance of the Sabine-Neches Canal, which was built before and was always maintained by the Government. It was in there by mistake, pure and simple.

Mr. MANN. I do not desire to see imposed upon the company anything which we ought not to do; but I desire very much to prevent a company, after making an offer to do a thing and getting the Government into it, from trying to get relieved from the undertaking.

Mr. DIES. In the Senate, I will say to the gentleman, this took place——

Mr. MANN. Never mind; I do not care what took place in the Senate.

Mr. DIES. All right. As it passed the House before we would not have relieved them from maintaining the law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order, so far as I am concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] withdraws the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Trinity River, Tex.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance by open-channel work, $15,000.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I made some remarks on the Trinity River, and have been much jumped on on account of it, and I also made some remarks on the Brazos.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a motion?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes; I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I would not want to strike out that $15,000 they give the Trinity River, after they have expended $2,225,000 on it trying to make it navigable, although it is wholly impossible. But I do insist that the House ought to have treated the Brazos and the Trinity alike. They both run through my district, and I do not believe in being partial.

They have put in this bill for the Brazos River $210,000 and have given the Trinity only $15,000—rivers running through the same character of territory, of about the same length, that have heretofore had about the same money expended on them. The engineers report that it will take, so far as they can determine, about the same amount to complete them, with about the same hope of navigation on each of them.

Mr. Chairman, I think this is a narrow, shallow, crooked, and dry way to treat the Trinity. We ought not to do it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman speaks of "the same hope of navigation." He is familiar with the country down there. These rivers flow through his district. Will he be kind enough to tell us what that same hope is?

Mr. CALLAWAY. I have had some experience with that hope. Some fellows down there jumped on me because of the rivers and harbors bill when I was running for Congress, and were going to beat me because I would not bring money to the district; and the man who specially made the same claim for the navigation of all Texas rivers that the gentleman from the head of navigation on the Brazos [Mr. HENRY] made on the floor of the House got about 4,000 votes in a poll of over 35,000 in the district. [Laughter.] I stood on the banks of the Trinity River and made fun of the ridiculous idea of pouring money into that stream with the hope of ever making it navigable. As I came up here the other day there was a man who lives on the banks of the Brazos got on the train at Granbury, on the banks of the Brazos, and looking down at it he said, "Wouldn't you like to see BOB HENRY trying to come up that sand flat on a boat." [Laughter.]

Now, I have not made a motion to strike this item out. Members of this House jump up and get red in the face and defend propositions in their own districts, and then when they come to vote every fellow who has got a dime in the bill sticks to the committee. The Trinity and Brazos Rivers are just as good and better projects than hundreds in this bill. That is the reason I call attention to these rivers. I know what I am talking about when it comes to the Trinity and the Brazos. I have been there and waded across them; I never had to swim. I have driven cattle and horses back and forth across them; yes, and could spit across them in places. Sometimes they get up so you can not spit across them. Right at this time you can not spit across them, I guess. It has been raining a lot lately. [Laughter.] Here is an editorial comment from a paper printed on the banks of the Trinity, 30 miles above navigation:

CONGRATULATIONS, DALLAS!

The navigation of the Trinity River is an assured fact we learn from the Dallas newspapers. Soon the chug chug of the panting engines as they propel the "big steamer" down the muddy waters of the Trinity will resound throughout the State, and farmers, awe-stricken, will gaze upon the strange and unusual sight as did the farmers along the banks of the Hudson when Fulton's Folly wended its way in the shadows of the Palisades years and years ago.

Enter Douglas the Third, the palatial craft that will cleave its 3 feet of draft from Dallas toward the blue waters of the Gulf. Enter the days of the old Mississippi River steamboat—light draft, high speed, the deep blue sky limit, the bar then ran from stem to stern, the gay old cavaliers who planted corn and consumed it in its liquid form.

We are glad to know that the Douglas the Third is to be a "big steamer." Measurements are 78 feet in length—not quite the distance between the home plate and first base—

[Laughter.]

She is 20 feet wide, just the combined length of 7 baseball bats, and she draws from 2½ to 3 feet of water. If the floods hold up, she may be able to make her maiden trip before waiting for the winter freshets. In time of war the Douglas the Third might be leased to Carranza and Villa as a gunboat to dock at the El Paso navy yard and patrol the Rio Grande.

We are not jealous. We are happy and gay in the thought that the good old days of the Mississippi, immortalized by Mark Twain, are about to return, and we, too, may have some of the joys which were the part of our fathers. Hasten the day.

I said that everybody in Texas not directly interested in the propositions knows that the Trinity and Brazos Rivers are not navigable. The gentleman from the Brazos has gone. The gentleman from the Trinity is here. Last year both the gentleman from the Brazos and the Trinity disputed that and jumped on me with both feet. I have some letters from prominent citizens giving their views on the Trinity's navigability.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I ask five minutes more.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Reserving the right to object for a moment, are those letters about the Trinity?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will not object, but the Trinity River is not in the bill.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Oh, yes, it is. Here is an appropriation of $15,000—a little measly appropriation compared with that for the Brazos.

I will prove by the proponent of this Trinity River project that these are good, substantial, leading, and public-spirited citizens.

CITIZENS' NATIONAL BANK,
Waxahachie, Tex., January 30, 1913.

Hon. OSCAR CALLAWAY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to commend you for your course on the rivers and harbors appropriation bill. That you are right in your position there can be no question. Money appropriated to make navigable dry creeks hundreds of miles away from tidewater is money wasted. How so-called engineers can make favorable reports on such schemes is past comprehension. But they do it. Many seem to think the Government a big institution, with money without limit, and that every dollar they can get from the Government, by any means, is fair, and that the people are gainers to that extent, when in truth all governments, as purely governments, are paupers. Every dollar the Government has must come from the people. If all these foolish appropriations were placed where good results would follow, it would be commended. Why Congressmen will vote for such wild, foolish appropriations is passing strange. It can only be assigned to ignorance or insincerity. The people are getting tired of such foolishness. I have heard many commend you for your stand.

Yours, truly,
O. E. DUNLAP.

Here is a letter from a man who has some interest in this appropriation. Listen to what he says:

THE CITIZENS' NATIONAL BANK,
Waxahachie, Tex., April 1, 1914.

Hon. OSCAR CALLAWAY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: From press reports I note that you have been opposed to further appropriations for the furtherance of the proposed navigation of the Trinity River. I do not think this a practical project at all, and I wish to congratulate you on the fair, unprejudiced stand you have taken, especially so in the face of all the opposition and criticism this stand has brought upon you. Personally the cleaning and clearing of the underbrush along the river would be of much personal benefit to me, as I have considerable land adjoining same, but I do not think it right that the funds of the Federal Government should be used in bringing this about, although, as stated, should the Trinity be made a navigable stream, it would be of considerable benefit to me and a project which would meet with my hearty support could I conscientiously believe it practicable, which I do not.

With best wishes to yourself, I am,

Yours, very truly,
R. W. GETZENDANER.

Now, if that is the sentiment of the people along its banks—and I take it that it is the sentiment of the people all along these little intermittent creeks and inconsequential harbors everywhere—why continue to waste the public money? When I made the fight a big, red-headed, freckle-faced man from Comanche, who had moved over to Dallas, told me that when the fight was going on and the two gentlemen from Texas were jumping on me, and papers down home printing what they were saying, the citizens of Dallas were saying on the streets of Dallas that CALLAWAY is right about it; it is a farce, but we want the money spent down here. He said that I might quote him. He was at that time and is now a citizen of Dallas.

The chamber of commerce at Fort Worth sent me a wire, and the gentleman from the Trinity read it last year, asking me to support the appropriation. That came from the chamber of commerce. It was not the views of the body of the people. I went home and I stood on the banks of the Trinity River, at Fort Worth, the place that wire came from, and spoke against such waste and carried that county over the man who was opposed to me, who lived there, by 1,500 votes. Why? The people there know that it is foolish. Mattewan Creek, Kissimme, the Little Pedee, and all these little, inconsequential and intermittent creeks are projects upon which it is foolish to spend money. There is no use in arguing that the railroad is behind this opposition. That is begging the question. Every common-sense man can see the foolishness in trying to beat down the freight on the railroads by appropriations while the Interstate Commerce Commission are raising the rates by rulings that the railroads may live.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Brazos River.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Wisconsin began to cast aspersions on Texas projects I felt some irritation. When the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] began to attack the river on which my friend HENRY lives and called it the Brāyzŏs, I began to be indignant; but when my own colleague [Mr. CALLAWAY] launched forth in an attack upon the Trinity, which is really the best project in the river and harbor bill, my indignation swells to the point where it can be no longer suppressed.

He attempts to claim some sort of knowledge with respect to the Trinity and Brazos, because, he says, they run through his district. That is not to their credit at all, and, like well-disposed rivers, they leave his district just as soon as they can. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield? They do not run out of there at all.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Oh, yes; they do run. They do not even hesitate about it. Now, my friend from Texas says that Fort Worth is upon the Trinity River. This river, as its name indicates, has three forks, two of which are very wet and one of which is dry. The dry fork happens to be the fork upon which Fort Worth is situated; and this may account for some of the things said and some of the things written by citizens of Fort Worth in opposition to the canalization of the Trinity River. Fort Worth is now a good town. At one time it was an ambitious town; it even essayed to be the rival of the great city of Dallas. That was in the past. It has been overshadowed and has now become an interesting suburb of Dallas, to which the people of that city like to go to find peaceful quietude and rest.

I was over there a few months ago myself. I found that it still attempts to imitate the ways of sure enough cities. In the middle of one of the principal streets I saw a policeman standing. It seemed to me that he must have been 7 feet in height. I had a few minutes to wait for a car after having finished pitching horseshoes and wanted to find some other kind of diversion, and so I ambled up to this policeman and said: "What are you doing?" He said, "I am a traffic policeman in Fort Worth." I looked up and down both streets, but saw few vehicles. I said, "How do you like your job?" He said, "Oh, fine, except that I get so darned lonesome." [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, my friend reads letters from two very estimable gentlemen from my own home town of Waxahachie who do not have faith in the Trinity River project. There are people there who have not—in the language of Billie Sunday—"hit the trail" and have not been converted to see its merits. There are benighted people there just as there are some benighted people in the House of Representatives who will not agree that the Trinity River project is one of superlative merit. There were people in my friend CALLAWAY'S district who were so unappreciative of him that several thousand of them voted against him, and probably more than two in his home town would volunteer the written opinion that it would be far easier to "improve" the Trinity River than to "improve" him. I really admire my colleague very much, and my regret is that he knows so little about what it takes to make a first-class river.

I was unavoidably kept away from here before the holidays. If I had been here, I believe that Mr. SUMNERS and I, together, could have touched the hearts of the genial, kindly chairman and of the other members of the committee and could have persuaded them to give a more generous recognition of the Trinity than is contained in this bill. I have no criticism to make of them. I suppose they did the very best they could. I am sure that they patiently and laboriously considered all of these many projects, and that conditions beyond their control compelled them to select some for present appropriation and to require others to await the next bill. I say this much in compliment of them. I think that if they had given the Trinity more than they did I could have said a good deal more in praise and compliment of them. [Laughter and applause.] They should not expect $100,000 worth of praise in exchange for only $15,000 of appropriation.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Does not the gentleman think that the Trinity is as good a proposition as the Brazos?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Of course the gentleman thinks that. The gentleman thinks that the Trinity River is the best of the two.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Did not the gentleman from the Brazos say in his speech last year that the Trinity was just as good as the Brazos?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I think that is universally conceded. I have never heard anyone contend that the Trinity was not the equal of the Brazos. This project has been before Congress for a good many years. It is true it gets only $15,000 in this bill, but I do not accept that as any evidence of the fact that there is any purpose on the part of the Government to abandon the project. I know the circumstances under which this bill was made, and I am confident in my expectation that when future river and harbor bills are made up the Trinity River will be recognized in accordance with its real merits.

Mr. Chairman, this is a sort of "swan song" of mine, so far as the Trinity River is concerned. I have struggled here as best I could for the last 10 or 12 years, trying to do something for this project, because I thought it was of vital importance to my section and to my State. I believe it is now, because the situation down there is a situation that demands some character of relief. During these 10 or 12 years Congress has dealt as generously with the Trinity River as conditions would permit. Something more than $2,000,000 have been appropriated. I think that every dollar of this sum has been secured in the House of Representatives. Sometimes the progress of improvement has seemed discouragingly slow. Seven locks and dams are in process of construction, and two more have been authorized to the extent of locating and securing their sites.

My colleague [Mr. CALLAWAY] says that some friend of his has advised him that the people of Dallas ridicule the proposition, that they have no faith in it, that they only want the appropriation. Let us look at the facts for just a minute. For the last 20 years the people of Dallas have been laboring to secure recognition of this project and appropriations for it. They gave $66,000 of their own money at one time, when the river and harbor bill required it. They have expended thirty or forty thousand dollars of their own money buying sites for locks and dams. They have expended many thousands of dollars securing the land necessary for wharves. They have issued bonds to provide a sewage-disposal plant that was made necessary because of the effort to make this river navigable. They have issued bonds to the extent of $700,000 therefor, and yet my friend indulges in the statement that the only interest people in Dallas have is to get these appropriations to be spent in that section of Texas.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Fort Worth has issued bonds to take care of its sewage.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes; but you have no other means of disposing of it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. We can turn it into the Trinity River.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. But you are on the dry fork of the Trinity, while we are on the river. Your city undertook it because the legislature of the State of Texas passed a law compelling you to do it, and prohibiting you from emptying your sewage into the Trinity River, while the people of Dallas undertook it years ago in order to aid this undertaking in which they have proven their faith. They have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in addition to that in building new bridges across the river so as not to interfere with and obstruct navigation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. The Government has appropriated something like $2,000,000, but for every dollar that the Government has appropriated the people of Dallas, the people who, according to my colleague, have no faith in the project and no interest except to secure Federal appropriations, have expended or have assumed obligations for an equal amount.

I will not go into the question as to the freight situation down there. It has been referred to many times before and in connection with other items in this bill. It is a desperate effort of the people in central Texas to find some avenue of escape, to find some means of relieving themselves of a situation that is an intolerable situation, a situation that handicaps them, a situation that impedes their progress and their prosperity, and yet, in spite of all this, my friend, who represents the district containing a city that is the rival of Dallas, says that it is an unworthy project; that the people there have no faith in it; that they ridicule it; and yet for every dollar that the Government has put into it the people of Dallas, because of the fact that they were interested in making this river navigable, have contributed or assumed obligations for an equal amount.

Now, Mr. Chairman, ever since I have been here people have been trying to poke fun at the Trinity River. In most instances it was because they did not know anything about it; because they did not appreciate our situation. If we had in Texas a bigger and better river than the Trinity, of course, that would be the one we would want improved. We have not, and we are compelled to accept the situation as it is.

We are sorry, far more sorry than you are, that there has been a question or that there could be a question about the water supply of the Trinity River. There is no question except with reference to section 1, from Dallas down to the junction with the East Fork, a distance of 50 miles. The Government undertook the project knowing that there was some question about the water supply in section 1. Mr. BURTON, who was then chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, knew the condition, knew that in certain seasons the flow of water in the river was small, and yet because of the situation in that great agricultural section he decided that the effort to canalize Trinity River should be made.

Gentlemen poke fun at it and say they began the improvement at the head of the river instead of at the mouth. They did. Congress transferred the appropriation that had been made for the lower section of the river to the upper, because it was recognized that if the first 50 miles could be canalized and made navigable there was no question about the balance of the river, and the struggle has been to try to complete the canalization of the first 50 miles of the river. We have a lock and dam at White Rock Shoals, another at Hurricane Shoals, two places on the lower stretches of the river where there are obstructions, because it was reasoned if we could canalize the first 50 miles and then have locks and dams at places where there are obstructions, that during a large part of every year, dry years, wet years, all kinds of years, we would have a navigable river for from 6 to 10 months of the year depending upon the varying rainfall. You take the Ohio and other rivers of the North and East; they are sometimes affected by low water, but almost every year they are frozen over for months in the winter, and this condition obstructs navigation just as surely and just as effectually as any condition of low water would affect the navigation of the Trinity River. It does not make any difference what the cause is that interfers with navigation; if it is interfered with, the result is just the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am ashamed to take five minutes more. It is so rare that I ask for time of the committee that I want to ask its indulgence while this item is up.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent for five minutes more?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Now, with all of these locks and dams in section 1 authorized, and with all but two constructed or approaching completion, we thought it was not unreasonable to hope for an appropriation in this bill sufficient to begin the construction of these two which would complete the improvement of section 1. When that is completed we believe the project will be a success. If it should not be, we will grieve far more than you, because it will mean the disappointment of the hopes of so many people who have been looking for and praying for some kind of relief.

Gentlemen have not succeeded during the past 10 years in driving the Trinity River out of court by attempting to ridicule it. They will not in the future. It is a recognized Government project, and the improvement of it is going on. My successor and the other Representatives from Texas interested will see to it that in the next river and harbor bill there will be an adequate appropriation for the Trinity River.

Trinity River has served one purpose at least. It has given certain gentlemen an opportunity to indulge in many witticisms that otherwise might have been denied them. I hope that in the future, if witticisms are indulged in, they will be new ones. I want to tell you now that some of the old ones are getting stale. They have talked about the boring of artesian wells up at the head of the river. That has done duty for 10 or 12 years. It should be barred by limitation in the future. They have talked about macadamizing it, and gentlemen have grown hilarious over the suggestion. We have heard that down in Texas until it has gotten old, too. And then they have proposed to insure it against fire. [Laughter.] And then they have advised that the bed of it should be used for the right of way for a railroad running from Dallas down to the Gulf. My colleague [Mr. CALLAWAY] claims to have waded it many times. All these statements have been very funny, but the improvement of the river has gone steadily on, and it will go on. In my opinion gentlemen will not be able to defeat this undertaking by ridicule, because the men upon this committee know more about the situation than the would-be funny men who attempt to indulge in humor at the expense of that project that means so much to that section of Texas.

I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, in order that I may not be precluded, I want to ask unanimous consent that before this item is passed—I understand the motion for the committee to rise is about to be made—I be given an opportunity to speak to it for 10 minutes. I shall not ask for that privilege now. I understand that the House wants to adjourn, but I do ask before the item is passed that I be allowed that privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. Whenever the gentleman desires to make that request the Chair will put it. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cypress Bayou, Tex. and La.: For maintenance, $2,500.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to make any request now?

Mr. SUMNERS. I do not want to interfere with the committee.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would suggest to the gentleman that he might speak to the next item when we reach it. I was about to move to rise.

Mr. MANN. Let the first Arkansas item be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ouachita River, Ark. and La.: For maintenance of improvement by open-channel work up to Camden, $25,000.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 20189) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills and joint resolution:

H. R. 6060. An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States;

H. R. 5195. An act for the relief of the Atlantic Canning Co.; and

H. J. Res. 234. Joint resolution directing the selection of a site for the erection of a statue in Washington, D. C., to the memory of the late Maj. Gen. George Gordon Meade.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BOWDLE, for three days, so as to deliver an address at Cincinnati.

To Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. O'SHAUNESSY, for two weeks, on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Red River.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Red River. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the income-tax section of the present tariff law.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks on the income-tax of the present tariff law. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING NEXT TUESDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Monday next it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on the following Tuesday. On account of the approaching end of this session, I think it is necessary to drive these bills, although I recognize it is entirely proper for gentlemen who are interested in them to have a reasonable opportunity to state the wishes of their constituents and to voice such criticism as they desire against a bill on the floor. I realize also that if these bills are not pushed from now on it may jeopardize their passage, and I therefore hope that when the House meets on Tuesday it will try to stay in session until this bill is passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns next Monday it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on Tuesday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, January 18, 1915, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate of appropriation which has been approved by the President in the sum of $50,000, to extend to the Governments of Central and South America an invitation to send representatives to a conference with the Secretary of the Treasury, in the city of Washington, and representative bankers of the United States, with a view to establishing closer and more satisfactory financial relations between their countries and the United States (H. Doc. No. 1493); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. Letter from the Secretary of War, submitting answers to questions propounded in House resolution No. 698, adopted by the House of Representatives on January 14, 1915 (H. Doc. No. 1492); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

(Legislative day of Friday, January 15, 1915.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19422) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Gallinger	Norris	Smoot
Brandegee	Hardwick	Overman	Sterling
Bryan	Hollis	Page	Stone
Burleigh	James	Perkins	Thomas
Burton	Johnson	Pomerene	Thornton
Catron	Jones	Reed	Tillman
Chamberlain	Kern	Robinson	Vardaman
Clapp	La Follette	Saulsbury	Walsh
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Sheppard	Warren
Colt	Lea, Tenn.	Shively	White
Culberson	Lippitt	Smith, Ariz.	Works
Cummins	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Fletcher	Myers	Smith, Mich.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] are unavoidably detained from the Chamber on business of the Senate. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Chair lays before the Senate certain petitions from the Wesley Chapel Methodist Episcopal Church, the First United Presbyterian Church, and the Petworth Baptist Church, of this city, praying for the prohibition of the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia. The petitions will be properly noted in the Journal.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, a letter from Dr. Charles M. Emmons in reply to certain correspondence which was put into the RECORD by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] a few days ago relating to the site for the Eastern High School.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EAST WASHINGTON CITIZENS' ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1915.

Hon. C. S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In view of the personal interest you manifested in the debate on the floor of the Senate in the matter of the selected site for the Eastern High School, I deem it but just to yourself, as well as important to the subject matter, to make brief reply to some statements contained in and inferences that might be drawn from the letters of Henry P. Blair and John B. Larner, appearing on page 1610 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday's proceedings.

By referring to the assessment books of the District of Columbia it will be found the Washington Loan & Trust Co., as trustee for the Equitable Building Association, of this city, controls lot 8 and part of lot 7 in square 1108, and also, as executor of the estate of J. Sprigg Poole, controls lots 40 and 41 in square 1095. These lots are all included within the boundaries of the proposed purchase.

The city directory shows that Mr. John B. Larner is vice president and general counsel of the said Washington Loan & Trust Co. and is also a director in the said Equitable Building Association. These two corporations are very closely connected, as is shown by the fact that Mr. John Joy Edson is president of both.

These two corporations with which Mr. Larner is conected necessarily have a fiduciary interest in the sale of these properties to the District of Columbia. As to the hearing before the board of education, mentioned in Mr. Blair's letter, I will state that the present proposed site had not been then selected. We appeared before the board of education to urge the selection of reservation No. 13. As a matter of fact, no public hearing whatsoever has been granted or had by the board of education or by the District Commissioners with reference to the purchase of this proposed site and the closing of the public streets.

Sincerely, yours,

CHARLES M. EMMONS, M. D.,
President East Washington Citizens' Association.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have one letter here that I received this morning, which I wish to have read. I simply desire to say that I have received a great many letters this morning along the same line, but this letter sets out the facts so clearly and succinctly that I ask that it be read. I am glad to know that this man is working for a great company and is not afraid to express his sentiments in regard to this question; that he is not afraid the company will call him to task for so doing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

256 NINTH STREET NE.,
January 17, 1915.

Senator JONES.

MY DEAR SIR: Your effort to clear the curse of the saloon from our Capital City meets with my approval. Trust that you may clear the corner Eleventh and C Streets NE., so that a lady may feel safe to pass that corner at night. I see no reason for such business to be placed in the eyes of so many homes and children. The nine years we have owned our home at Ninth and C Streets NE. our lady friends who were alone making calls always left early at night, stating they were afraid to pass this saloon after dark. The colored people seem to be the greater number around this saloon. We have two clean sons, 22 and 24 years, and would like to keep them so. Without the saloon I will feel more sure. You won't have time to read all such lengthy letters, but trust mine may help the cause.

Very truly, yours,

WILLIAM A. PIERSON,
Passenger Conductor, Pennsylvania Railroad.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have a brief editorial here from the Commoner on this subject which I would be glad to have read.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask if it is the same editorial the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] put in the RECORD on Saturday?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is not.

Mr. JONES. I desire to say that the Senator from Washington put in no editorial from the Commoner.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NATIONAL PROHIBITION IN CONGRESS.

In the last issue of the Commoner I expressed the opinion that this was not an opportune time to propose a national prohibition amendment, not because of any objection to the principle involved—I stated I would vote for the amendment if submitted—but because the submission of such an amendment at this time would divert attention from other issues pressing for consideration without advancing the cause of prohibition

On another page will be found the vote upon the amendment. It will be seen that while it lacked the two-thirds necessary to pass such a resolution, it received a majority of eight—a striking proof of the growing tide against the liquor business.

While the brewers and distillers are congratulating themselves that the prohibition forces could not secure a two-thirds majority, they are looking with blanched faces and trembling hearts upon the declaration, solemnly made on roll call, that a clear majority of the people's Representatives in Congress are arrayed against rum selling.

As it only requires a majority to pass laws, the liquor interests see in the vote on the amendment the beginning of the end of their supremacy. The death knell of the saloon has been sounded, and it is only a question of a few years when the business, now made an outlaw, will be driven from the highways and forced into the secret places, where, after a few years more of fugitive life, it will meet its death. From now on the liquor business can consider itself a fugitive from justice, living in constant fear of arrest and punishment.

Many who voted for the prohibition amendment were opposed to its submission at this time, but, when compelled to vote yes or no, they preferred to ally themselves with the temperance forces rather than run the risk of being counted on the side of the saloon. Others, who have fought the liquor interests in their several States, voted against the submission of the amendment at this time because they preferred to center the fight on the States where it is at issue rather than to have the attack scattered over the entire country. These will be for a national amendment whenever they think the time is ripe for such action, and in the meantime they will redouble their energies and enter with still more earnestness into the State contests against the liquor interests. The temperance element will not deal harshly with the man who voted "No," provided he is in the forefront of the battle in his State, but woe unto the man who pleads "State rights" against national prohibition and then allies himself with the liquor interests in his State! He will find it difficult to convince his constituents that his arguments against the exercise of national authority on the subject expressed his real reason for voting "No."

W. J. BRYAN.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I introduced and had read into the RECORD on Saturday an editorial from the Commoner of some weeks ago. The Senator from Texas has now had read an editorial from the last issue of the Commoner. On the third page of that same issue there is another editorial by Mr. Bryan on this same subject, which I think should also be inserted in the RECORD and read. I ask to have that done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE RIGHTS NOT MENACED.

The discussion of the proposed national prohibition amendments has brought out a new lot of mock heroics on the subject of local self-government. Some of the "wets," in attempt to justify their opposition to national prohibition, express great fear lest the national authority shall trample upon the "imperishable rights of local self-government." What perishable tommy rot!

The insincerity of these protestations is manifest when it is remembered that the liquor interests are just as jealous of "the imperishable rights of interstate commerce" as they are of "the imperishable local self-government"; it depends entirely upon the case which is being presented.

If a State attempts to deal with the liquor question a hoard of saloon sympathizers raise a chorus against the "invasion of the rights of the National Government." They insist that "commerce between the States must be protected"; "the arm of the National Government must not be paralyzed"; "fanaticism must not be permitted to suspend the traffic between the various Commonwealths of the Nation," etc.

Whenever, however, the authority of the National Government is invoked we find this same crowd worshiping at the shrine of "State rights" and beating their breasts in frantic fear lest the people may be robbed of the sacred right to control their own affairs.

Those who regard the saloon as an unalloyed evil and seek to abate the nuisance need not worry themselves about the hypocritical arguments presented by those who prey upon the welfare of society and make a merchandise of morals. The right to class alcohol as a poison; the right to protect society against those who would make money by administering this poison to their fellow men—this right can be exercised without any danger either to the authority of the National Government or to the rights of local communities. It will be a sad day for this country when the brewers, the distillers, and the saloon keepers are made the custodians of either national or local authority.

The rights of the city are not trampled upon when township option is adopted, as it has been in some States; such legislation simply enlarges the unit and places the control of the liquor traffic in the hands of a greater number of people. The rights of local self-government are not imperiled by legislation which makes the county, instead of the township, the unit—which has been done in a number of States. No more is local self-government menaced when the State is made the unit, as it has been in some 14 States. The same reasoning holds true when the legislative unit is the Nation, instead of the State.

If the readers of the Commoner will take notice they will find that whenever a choice is to be made between two units, the liquor interests always choose the smaller unit—no matter which two are under consideration. If the question is between national prohibition and State prohibition, the liquor interests are the vociferous champions of the State's right to act. When, however, the choice is between State prohibition and county option, the liquor interests are just as vehemently in favor of county option. If it is a choice between county option and township option, the liquor interests are out beating their tom-toms and shouting for precinct option; if the choice is between township option and city, town, or village option, the liquor interests bring out their cohorts and make their fight for the least unit, and there is just as much sincerity in their arguments in one case as in any other; but there is no sincerity in their arguments in any case, it is all a matter of pecuniary interest.

To carry the illustration further, they would favor ward option as against city option, and they would favor giving the option to the block instead of to the ward. Finally, they would demand that the option be exercised by the individual rather than by any governmental unit, and they would do this in the name of "personal liberty," although if the manufacturers of intoxicants were in position to enforce their decrees, they would make drinking compulsory, even if they had to tie their victim and force alcohol down him as stated intervals—they would do it, of course, for the benefit of the victim's health.

When it is understood that the arguments made in favor of the liquor traffic are not the real ones that actuate those who make them, why should the opponents of the saloon pay any attention to them?

Experience has taught that the unit is enlarged in proportion as public sentiment against the saloon increases, and a national prohibition amendment will be submitted as soon as enough States adopt prohibition to make the ratification of the amendment probable. When that time comes, the reserved rights of the States will be just as sacredly guarded as they are now, or ever have been—they will be guarded by intelligent and sober freemen who believe in the theory upon which our Government is founded. It only brings "State rights" into ridicule to have the phrase made a mask for a disreputable business which is fighting to perpetuate the privilege of debauching a nation.

W. J. BRYAN.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, in view of the statements made here by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] on Saturday last, regarding the excise board of this District, which, if they are half true, the Senate owes the duty to itself and to the country that they should be diligently inquired into, I desire to make a motion.

I am unalterably opposed to prohibition, but I am square, and I believe in being square. To that end, I move that a committee of five be appointed by the President of the Senate to inquire into all the charges which have been made by the Senator from Washington.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I had intended this morning making some remarks upon the question before the Senate. I realize, however, that the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], who has been primarily back of this amendment, is a member of the dominant party; I realize that the dominant party is charged with the enactment of legislation at this session, that it has what might be called "a program," and that continued debate upon this question has and that further debate will subject the author of the amendment to the criticism of delaying the action of the policy or the program of his dominant party. The Senator in charge of the matter feels that it is wise that there be no unnecessary loss of time in taking a vote upon this measure; therefore, rather than embarrass him, unless I shall discover later this morning a tendency to delay and postpone the vote, I shall refrain from addressing the Senate upon the subject. Later when this question comes up, as it will if not successful at this time, I shall discuss the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. JAMES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays are called for. Is the request seconded?

Mr. REED. I call for a statement of the question, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I intend to detain the Senate but a very few moments. The real question before the Senate is as to whether or not we shall suspend the rules. I am going to vote upon that question, and upon no other.

Mr. President, I am opposed to suspending the rules of this body, particularly the one that is asked to be suspended at this time. We are asked to suspend Rule XVI, paragraph 3, providing:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject matter contained in the bill be received.

Mr. President, I believe there is no necessity for suspending the rules at this time. The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] can get a vote upon this question in the Senate in a more direct way. The same question has been presented to the Senate in a bill introduced by the Senator from Texas, which is now before a committee of this body. If that committee does not desire to report the bill to the Senate, the Senator from Texas has a perfect right to move to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill, and that the Senate itself consider the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. What chance does the Senator think a bill reported and passed by the Senate in that manner would have in the other House at this session?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator takes that position, that is another good reason why action such as proposed should not be taken.

Mr. SHEPPARD. No; the reason for acting upon it in this way is that this is a House appropriation bill and it will go through in this way.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the Senator's position, but I am opposed to any such way of legislating. It is for that reason that I oppose the suspension of the rules.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has the Senator from Utah always taken that position?

Mr. SMOOT. I have, Mr. President; but this question has never arisen before in the Senate during my service here. I have in the past consented to legislation going upon appropriation bills where it was the almost unanimous wish of this body, where there was very little sentiment against it, but wherever there is such a vital question as this involved I do not believe that this is the proper way to reach it.

I want to say, however, that if this question should be referred to the people of the District of Columbia and I had an opportunity to vote upon it, I should vote for prohibition in the District, as I voted and would again vote for prohibition in my home city. I simply wanted to make this statement so that my position could not be misunderstood. It is for this reason, Mr. President, that I shall vote against suspending the rules, and that is the sole and only question before the Senate at this time.

I could discuss the question of prohibition and state my attitude upon it, but I do not think it is now necessary. I do, however, think that this body ought to change Rule XL, and change it as quickly as possible, in conformity with the sentiment expressed by this body. I shall first give notice of my intention to do so, and then I shall offer an amendment and have it referred to the Committee on Rules, amending Rule XL to read as follows:

RULE XL.

SUSPENSION AND AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof, and shall require a vote of two-thirds, and shall be decided without debate.

Mr. President, I think that will make Rule XL clear. I think that when the question of the suspension of the rules is presented it should be decided without debate, and if the rules are to be suspended, unless by unanimous consent, they should only be suspended when there is involved a question of vital importance to the welfare of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do I understand the Senator as suggesting that an amendment to the rules should require a two-thirds vote?

Mr. SMOOT. My suggestion was a proposed amendment to Rule XL, requiring a two-thirds vote to suspend a rule of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. To suspend?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood the Senator to say "or amend." Manifestly, we ought to be able to amend our rules by a majority vote.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President; that is true. I wrote the proposed amendment hurriedly, and did not notice at the time that the amendment as prepared would apply to a motion to amend the rules.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The suggestion of the Senator is simply that a motion to suspend the rules shall be considered without debate and shall require a two-thirds vote?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But a rule may be modified by a majority vote just as heretofore?

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely. That was my intention; but, as I have explained, I hurriedly wrote out the proposed amendment. That, however, will be the effect of the amendment and will be the wording when it is finally drafted.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong the discussion of this matter, but I believe it important at this time to give the Senate some important instances of the addition of general legislation to appropriation bills in this body.

It is not an uncommon practice to add provisions embodying general legislation to appropriation bills. The entire bill creating a public-utilities commission, a measure composed of 103 sections, was placed upon the District appropriation bill by the Senate on February 19, 1913. Almost immediately after that measure was added to the District appropriation bill the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] offered as an amendment what was known as the "excise bill." That bill was composed of 27 distinct and comprehensive sections, and it was likewise added to the District appropriation bill.

In the Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, an amendment providing for the establishment of civil government in the Philippine Islands was placed upon the Army appropriation bill. The President pro tempore, Mr. Frye, submitted the question of order to the Senate, and the Senate by a vote of 39 to 23 determined that the amendment was in order. I call attention to that vote, because the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] endeavored to create the impression that the Senate had only added provisions embodying general legislation to appropriation bills when there was practical unanimity on the subject.

Again, an amendment providing for the construction of a telegraph cable between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands and appropriating $500,000 for that purpose, was placed upon the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill. Mr. Blackburn raised the question of order that it was general legislation on an appropriation bill; the then Vice President, Mr. Stevenson, submitted the question of order to the Senate, and it was voted in order by a vote of 36 to 25. Here were measures involving general legislation about which there was great difference of opinion and which were added to appropriation bills.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] succeeded some months ago in attaching the migratory bird law to the agricultural appropriation bill. The Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] raised the point of order that it was general legislation. The question was submitted to the Senate, the Senate deliberately voted it in order, and the amendment went upon the bill.

Mr. President, the only difference between the Senate in adding general legislation to appropriation bills and myself in the effort I am now making has been that the Senate has added general legislation in a roundabout and indirect way, while I have attempted to do it in an orderly way and in accordance with the rules. It seems that my proposition to do a thing properly in the Senate has shocked some Senators, who have stood here and permitted general legislation to be added to appropriation bills by means of a parliamentary subterfuge.

The ordinary practice is to have an agreement with the Chair to submit the question to the Senate, Is the matter said to be general legislation in order? Then the Senate, while technically voting on the point of order, votes upon the merits of the proposition.

I have but one further thing to say, and that is that the excise bill, of which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] were joint authors, after having been referred to the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, was reported to the Senate and passed. It then went to the House, where it was permanently held up in the House Committee. The only way that bill could then have been passed was by adding it to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and that was done. I did not attempt to have the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia report out my prohibition bill, because I felt, even if the Senate passed it, the influence which held up and in that way defeated the excise bill in the House would also hold up and stifle my measure for prohibition for the District.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, a good deal of the discussion which has taken place in the Senate with reference to this rule I think might be characterized as somewhat disingenuous. Senators have argued that we have put upon appropriation bills in the past items of general legislation. That is probably true; but whenever it has been done it has either been done by unanimous consent of the Senate, by which, of course, any rule can be suspended or any procedure adopted which may be desired, or it has been done upon a vote of the Senate declaring that the proposed amendment was in order.

The Senator from Texas has just criticized the Senate for doing the very things which he has been citing as illustrations in support of what he is himself undertaking to do.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Oh, no; not at all, Mr. President.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Texas has just cited some cases where the Senate has voted that certain proposed legislation was in order upon an appropriation bill, and proceeded to say that he did not proceed in that way; that he was proceeding in an orderly way. If that is not equivalent to saying that the Senate in proceeding in the other cases was out of order, then I am incapable of understanding the significance of the English language.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I did say it had proceeded out of order, but I did not say that I did not indorse its action in proceeding out of order along that line. If the Senator will pardon me, my real reason for citing these instances was due to the fact that it was stated here on the floor on Saturday last that I was introducing a revolutionary innovation, and a dangerous practice in attempting to add an item of general legislation onto an appropriation bill; and it was suggested that I was embarrassing the President by attaching a substantive measure to an appropriation bill. It was for that reason that I cited the fact that it was not an uncommon practice for the Senate to add general legislation to appropriation bills, and that in adding that general legislation it has proceeded in a way not permitted by the language of the rules.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, Mr. President, the Senate undoubtedly has put upon appropriation bills items which might be termed "general legislation," and yet with reference to those items there was evidently a difference of opinion, and I am not prepared to say that it was not an honest difference of opinion. Some Senators when the question was presented have voted that the proposed item was in order; in other words, that it was not general legislation, and a majority of the Senate has declared, and by their votes have determined, that the item was not obnoxious to the rule. I do not think that it lies in the mouth of any Member of this body to impeach the integrity and good faith of his fellow Members in that way. Whenever——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment—whenever the Senate has voted by a majority that a particular item was in order, I am not prepared to say that that majority was not voting in accordance with its honest opinions about it. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it was my fortune or misfortune to be overruled on two occasions when I had the honor to preside over the Senate when I decided that certain matters, being general legislation, were obnoxious to the rule, but the Senate voted that I was wrong. After that vote was taken Senators came to me and said that they knew the ruling was right, but they wanted to put the item on the bill, and they put it there.

Mr. SMOOT. That often happens.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know who those Senators were. I know perfectly well that the Senator from Utah who is now on his feet was not one of them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it does not admit of argument that the Senate puts general legislation on appropriation bills when it wants to do it, whether it is in accordance with the rule or not. That is a truism that can not be denied.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from New Hampshire of course is welcome to his own opinion about that; but however that may be, the proposition now pending before the Senate is whether the Senate will deliberately suspend a wise rule of this character for the purpose of putting upon an appropriation bill an item which everybody concedes is general legislation. I am not going to enter upon a discussion of that question. I have some very pronounced views about it, however.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not for a moment. I think the rule is a very wise one. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] the other day, in his brief discussion of this subject, put it in such a way that it seems to me no unprejudiced man could differ with him; and I agree with and indorse what he said upon that subject. The rule which requires that general legislation shall not be put upon an appropriation bill is a wise one, and the rules ought not to be suspended unless the matter is one of the most vital concern.

I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I want to say to the Senator that I do not think any legislation affecting the District of Columbia is general legislation from the standpoint of Congress. Congress is legislating for the Nation, and the essential definition of general legislation is that it shall apply to all parts of the country and to all persons.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, Mr. President, upon reflection the Senator from Texas himself will not insist upon that definition of general legislation. General legislation is legislation which applies uniformly to the class with which you are dealing. If you are dealing with the whole Nation, legislation which deals with the whole Nation is general legislation. If you are dealing with a particular State, legislation which affects the whole State is general legislation. If you are dealing with the District of Columbia, any legislation which deals with the entire District of Columbia is general legislation. This is a general appropriation bill, and this proposition to enforce prohibition in the District is clearly general legislation.

Mr. President, upon the main question which is involved here I desire to say a word. I believe in prohibition. I believe that the people of this country would be far better off if no intoxicating liquor were permitted to be sold or used at all. I think that would be an ideal condition, because I think intoxicating liquor has done precious little good in this world, and it has done an infinite amount of harm. It is possible that in some cases it may be useful as a medicine; but I, for one, would be glad to forego whatever small benefit may result from its use as a medicine in order that we might accomplish the great good that would result from the abolishment of its use altogether. But it is one thing, Mr. President, to pass a law declaring for prohibition, and it is quite another thing to enforce it.

This is not a new question. The sentiment of the country upon prohibition has ebbed and flowed for the past 60 or 70 years. More than 60 years ago Neal Dow, that great exponent of prohibition, succeeded in bringing about a state of sentiment in Maine in response to which the people of Maine voted for State-wide prohibition. I do not care what anybody says about it; I have spent some time in the State of Maine, and I know what has been going on there, and there is not any doubt that State-wide prohibition in the State of Maine is a farce. It does not prohibit. What results is that liquor is imported from the surrounding States, a very large part of it from the city of Boston.

Every year the State of Maine is flooded with letters from liquor houses in Boston and other places inviting the people to purchase liquor and have it transported to them by express. They will send to you, if you are in Maine, a letter calling your attention to what they are selling, and they will inclose in the letter a blank order giving the names of the various kinds of liquors, and all you have to do is to fill in the quantity you want and send them back the printed order list.

Some four or five years ago I spent several weeks at a little village in Maine—an ordinary fishing village of perhaps 600 or 700 people. There was a drug store in that village which would have done credit to the city of Washington. Upon one occasion I went to the express office and I saw in the room a large collection of packages. I said to the expressman, "How does it happen that you are getting so much express matter up here in this little village?" He told me that three-fourths of it consisted of shipments of liquor.

The vice of the situation is that it brings into the prohibition State of Maine a class of liquor which ought not to be brought there. If people are going to drink at all, I think it is better that they should drink liquor which contains the least quantity of alcohol. The ardent spirits are certainly more harmful than the light beers and the light wines. I am not speaking of the high-proof wines, because I think the high-proof wines are quite as injurious as the whiskies and brandies; but the result of it is to promote in the State of Maine the consumption of the more ardent spirits and to discourage the consumption of the beers and the light wines, because the beers and the light wines come in larger packages, and it is a good deal easier to bring into the State of Maine a quart of whisky than it is a case of beer. So that has been the effect of it.

I was told that in the city of Bangor, Me., there were pending on the docket of the municipal court 436 cases; that 400 of those 436 cases were prosecutions for violation of the liquor law; that out of those 400 cases but one conviction resulted. I was told that by a gentleman whom I regard as reputable.

To my mind, the ideal way to deal with the liquor question is by local option, because when you have a community which votes in favor of prohibition under the local-option plan you have behind your vote the force of a sentiment which will bring about at least the measurable success of the law. Now, take an illustration: Here is a town of three or four thousand people, and we will say that 100 per cent of those people believe in prohibition and vote for it. Of course, everybody having voted for prohibition, the law in that town is going to be a complete success. But we will suppose that 80 per cent voted in favor of prohibition and 20 per cent against it. Then the law is going to be pretty nearly successful, because the 80 per cent are so strong as compared with the 20 per cent that they can enforce their law. But take a case where 51 per cent of the people vote for it and 49 per cent against it. Then you have an exceedingly difficult problem. It is going to be an exceedingly difficult thing for the sentiment represented by the 51 per cent to compel the 49 per cent to yield to it.

Communities teach by example, precisely the same as individuals do. I used to hear it said that when a community voted out the saloon it injured the business of the town, that the law could not be enforced, and all that sort of thing. I do not believe it. I think that when a town has voted "dry" with a fairly good majority the law can be enforced, and as a general thing is enforced, with measurable success. I am sure the town is cleaner and better for getting rid of the saloon, and I am sure that in the long run it does not in any way injure business; but if it did injure business, that would be no reply. We could afford to injure business to some extent to get rid of the evils which result from the saloon. So when I speak about prohibition, when I opposed in my own State four years ago State-wide prohibition as contrasted with local option, it was not because I believed in the saloon, because I do not; I am as strongly opposed to the saloon as anybody, but it was because I wanted the law which could be made most nearly successful, which would accomplish the best results.

When a State by a majority vote attempts to put into operation prohibition for the entire State, the effect of it is to vote prohibition into a community where the majority sentiment is against prohibition just the same as it votes prohibition into a community where the majority sentiment is in favor of it; and it is the community which, in the last analysis, enforces a law of that character. Where a majority of the people of a community have had foisted upon them a law which for any reason they did not believe should have been put upon them, that law is bound to be more or less of a dead letter.

Local option on the whole has operated well in my own State. More than nine-tenths of the State in area is "dry." The law is being administered with reasonable success; more successfully, it is true, in some towns than in others. Now these communities, as I said a moment ago, are teaching by example, just as an individual teaches by example.

For instance, here is one community that upon a vote has voted "wet," because the people of that community think the law can not be enforced, or for a variety of other reasons. Another community, some little distance off, has voted "dry." People from the "wet" community come to the "dry" community, and they see that the law is being enforced; they see that business is not suffering; they see that conditions have been bettered. They go back to their own community and say: "Why, we insisted that the law could not be made a success, but we have been over to such and such a town and we find that it is being made a success"; and they have the force of the sentiment of that individual who theretofore was against the "dry" town thereafter in favor of it. So, gradually, the territory is gained step by step; and the advantage of it is that as you make each gain of territory you have put behind the gain the sound, determined sentiment of the majority of the people.

I venture to say that, with the possible exception of Kansas, the local-option plan has done more for the cause of temperance in the United States than has the State-wide plan.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I said a moment ago that this was no new question. The tide has been ebbing and flowing for 60 years.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I can not let that statement go without making some observations, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am very nearly through, and I hope the Senator will defer what he has to say.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply wanted to say that I represent, in part, a State that has prohibition, and not a single saloon will be found in my State nor a single place where liquor is sold as a beverage.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am prepared, of course, to accept the statement of the Senator from North Dakota. The conditions in North Dakota are very much as they are in Kansas, only I think they are better. If I had thought of North Dakota when I was speaking, I should have added North Dakota to my statement; but the conditions in Kansas and in North Dakota are peculiarly favorable to the enforcement of the State-wide prohibition law, and whenever conditions are peculiarly favorable I should be in favor of the State-wide plan. It is, in my mind, wholly a question as to which plan can be made most successful. That is all there is about it. Under what form of law can you best promote temperance?

The population of Kansas, in the main, is a rural population. They have been educating sentiment in Kansas for 30 years in favor of prohibition. There are people in Kansas who have grown to maturity without ever having seen a saloon. The sentiment in favor of prohibition is peculiarly strong in that State, and from what I have heard about it I believe the law is quite successful in that State. I am just as certain that it is not at all successful in the State of Maine, which I have just described. The same thing will apply to North Dakota. If they had saloons in North Dakota they would not have as much intemperance as they would have in a State where more people were in favor of drinking. A comparatively small number of the population of that State desire to drink at all, and so the conditions are exceedingly favorable for the enforcement of a prohibitory law.

I want to give the Senate now a very brief résumé of what happened some 50 or 60 years ago with respect to this question. Under the impulse given by Neal Dow, for whom I have the greatest possible admiration, the State of Maine declared for State-wide prohibition.

Under that same impulse the State of New York declared for prohibition. That is a fact which is, I think, not generally understood. The great State of New York at one time, 50 or 60 years ago, voted for State-wide prohibition. The State of Delaware, the State of Illinois, the State of Indiana, the State of Nebraska, the State of Rhode Island, the State of Massachusetts, the States of Connecticut, Michigan, Vermont, and New Hampshire all at that time declared for State-wide prohibition. There were altogether 13 States with a State-wide prohibitory law upon their books. I think there are 10 to-day. That was at a time back in the fifties and late forties, when we had about 30 States; so nearly one-half the States of the Union at that time declared in favor of State-wide prohibition.

In New York the law was never attempted to be enforced, because it was declared to be unconstitutional. No attempt was made to amend the constitution so as to provide for State-wide prohibition.

In Delaware the law, after a trial of two years, was repealed.

In Illinois, after a trial of two years, the law was repealed.

In Indiana and in Nebraska, after a trial of three years, the State-wide prohibition law was repealed.

In Rhode Island they tried it for 11 years and then repealed it.

In Massachusetts they tried the law for 23 years and then repealed it.

In Connecticut and in Michigan the law was in operation for many years—I do not remember how many—and then it was repealed.

In Vermont and New Hampshire the law was tried for many years, and in those two States it has been repealed. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] undoubtedly knows more about the situation in his State than I do. It is sufficient to say that after the people of New Hampshire had tried prohibition for many years they concluded that it was a failure. I do not know the exact form of the law, but they went to some form of law that permits the sale of intoxicating liquor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Prohibition was the policy of New Hampshire probably for over 40 years. The law was repealed and a local-option law substituted by the legislature. The question was never submitted to the people of New Hampshire, and I am satisfied that if it was submitted the State of New Hampshire would be largely in favor of a prohibitory law for the entire State.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator may be right about that; but as it is a mere matter of opinion, I beg leave to differ with him. The law of New Hampshire had been in operation for 40 years, and if it had been a success, if the large majority of the people of New Hampshire believed that the cause of temperance was being more nearly promoted by the State-wide law than by a local-option law, I do not think any legislature would have undertaken to repeal such a law.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is speaking from the Utah standpoint, not the New Hampshire standpoint. In my own city we submitted the question only a few months ago. The churches were for no license, the best people of the city were for no license, but in the last four days of that campaign the city was flooded with money sent in there by the wholesale liquor dealers of Boston and elsewhere, the scum of the city was gathered together at the polls, and they defeated no-license by about 100 votes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Under local option?

Mr. GALLINGER. Under local option.

I want to say to the Senator that when the prohibitory law was repealed in New Hampshire I was told that money was used in one way and another to secure that result. There is little question about it, I regret to say. And other powerful influences were invoked to influence the legislature.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am sorry to hear that indictment by the Senator from New Hampshire of his own State legislature.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is an indictment that will lie in one shape or another against every legislature in this country. There are some men who can be corrupted in legislatures, and the liquor people know how to corrupt them. The liquor men are more cunning and more efficient in that direction than any other class of people in the world. Without using money directly upon the legislature other influences can be brought to bear that are equally effective.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is a vast deal of corruption among people who deal in intoxicating liquor. It is not a business which commends itself to me any more than it does to the Senator from New Hampshire. But one difficulty with many of the advocates of prohibition is the intemperance of their mental attitude toward people who differ with them, not as to the results to be obtained, all agree to that, but as to the wisdom of the way in which we shall bring about those results. If two men believe in prohibition, believe in getting rid of the saloon, believe in temperance, and one of them advocates State-wide prohibition he condemns the other who believes in local option as a tool of the saloon; and that is an absolutely unfair attitude of mind. People who are advocating local option are just as honest and just as earnest in their desire to promote the cause of temperance as those who are advocating State-wide prohibition.

I call attention to the action of these 13 States—12 States, because Maine has not changed—but I call attention to the attitude of these 12 States, constituting at that time more than a third of the States of the Union, as indicating what was the deliberate opinion of the people of those States after a trial of the system of State-wide prohibition. They tried it for periods varying from 2 to 23 years, 40 years in the case of New Hampshire, and it is significant that at the end of that period a majority of the people, whatever may be the case in New Hampshire, in many of those States, at any rate, concluded that the better way to deal with the liquor question was by local option.

It is the last expression of the opinion of those people upon it, and it is worth something. To my mind the action of the people of Massachusetts, which tried the State-wide prohibition system for 23 years and then set it aside for local option, is a good deal more instructive and a great deal more significant than the action of some States which vote State-wide prohibition for the first time. Massachusetts tried it. They found at one time in the city of Boston that approximately in value one-tenth of the property of that city, in a State-wide prohibition State, was being devoted in one form or another to the promotion of the liquor business. Some of the best men in Massachusetts who investigated the subject put themselves on record as declaring that the State-wide prohibition law was a failure and asking for local option.

Now, Mr. President, I am not going to prolong this debate.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand the Senator to say that the last expression of the people in a prohibition State on the question of prohibition was in New Hampshire when it was a prohibition State, and that the vote was strongly against prohibition?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In New Hampshire.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir. That should weigh heavily in this matter if it were true. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the last election in the State of Kansas we had that question directly before the people, after 34 years of prohibition. We cast in that State 528,206 votes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator evidently did not understand what I said.

Mr. THOMPSON. Just a moment. We had one candidate for governor on a resubmission ticket. That gentleman received only 47,201 votes, or less than 9 per cent of the vote of the people of Kansas on that important question. This was the last expression of the people in a prohibition State, and was strongly in favor of its continuance, and I hope forever settles that question, so far as my State is concerned.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator is indulging in the cheerful practice of building up something that I did not say at all for the purpose of answering it. What I said was that I would rather take the judgment of a State which had tried State-wide prohibition for 40 years than to take the judgment of a State which had just declared for it.

I was contrasting the State of Massachusetts with one of those States. I have already said that I think the State-wide law is measurably successful in Kansas. If I were a resident of Kansas I would not vote to repeal it. I think the conditions in Kansas under State-wide prohibition are better than they would be with the saloon, and I think they are better in North Dakota because of the conditions I have stated.

But what is a good rule for Kansas or for North Dakota may not be at all a good rule for some other States. I am quite sure that any attempt to provide for prohibition in the great city of New York would be an absolute failure. I think it would be a failure in almost all the great cities of the Union. But we have States composed of rural population and small communities, and I have no doubt that there it can be made measurably successful and more successful in the cause of temperance than the open saloon under strict regulation.

I forgot to enumerate among the States that have declared for State-wide prohibition, the State of Iowa, which my good friend [Mr. KENYON] represents. They have put into the constitution of Iowa a provision for prohibition, and yet there is no prohibition in Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I think the Senator wants to be correct about that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. The State voted for constitutional prohibition by about 30,000 majority, and it was held unconstitutional by the courts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They never attempted to amend the constitution, did they?

Mr. KENYON. They did; but at that time it required a resolution to twice pass the legislature.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is generally understood that Iowa has voted for State-wide prohibition, and it is also understood that the people of Iowa have deliberately and quite frankly recognized under certain circumstances the saloon, and the saloon flourishes to some extent in the State of Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Under the mulct law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The mulct law.

Mr. KENYON. The mulct law was copied after the Ohio law providing for a petition and statement and matters of that character.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, that is all I desire to say on that subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. REED. I simply want to say, in order to clear up the matter for the RECORD, that Iowa adopted a constitutional provision. The law was declared to be unconstitutional, because the constitution declared it not to have been properly adopted. Thereupon the people and the legislature adopted a prohibitory law which was very stringent. Subsequently, after trying that law for a number of years, they adopted what is known as the mulct law, so that there are saloons regularly established in the State of Iowa in practically all the cities, I think. There is in connection with that I think a local-option regulation.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator has stated the situation correctly as to the mulct law. There are some 8 or 10 counties called wet in the State of Iowa; the balance of the State is dry.

Mr. REED. For instance, in most of the largest cities?

Mr. KENYON. I think so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Missouri has stated what was my general understanding of the situation in Iowa. I have not given any attention to this matter for some time, but I knew that in some way there was a law—I was under the impression it was a constitutional provision—which prohibited the sale of liquor in Iowa, and that that law had been set aside and they had adopted a law which they call a mulct law, under which, I understand, whenever a majority of the people in a given locality petition to have a saloon established the petition is granted, or there is some such arrangement as that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is equivalent to local option.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is equivalent to local option; only the burden is upon the petitioners to secure a majority in favor of the license system instead of the other way.

Mr. KENYON. It is a very skillful law. It practically gives local option to the counties.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is local option.

Mr. KENYON. Practically local option.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I wish there were no cities that wanted liquor; but so far as there are cities in the Union where a considerable majority of the people desire to purchase liquor and desire that liquor shall be sold, it is perfect folly, to my mind, to attempt to force prohibition upon those communities. We must simply go on and educate the public sentiment as it is being educated.

Mr. President, in spite of the fact that the per capita consumption of liquor in the United States seems to be larger now than it ever has been, notwithstanding that, we all know, from our daily observation, that there is less drunkenness in the country than there ever has been. The great body of men who are working upon the railroads in the operating department are almost a body of teetotalers, because it has been borne in upon them that the wisest thing for them to do is to refrain from drinking intoxicating liquor. It is the same way in other employments; less and less liquor is being consumed immoderately all over the country. I think the cause of temperance is growing all over the country. We must simply proceed with the matter in a sane way with a view of obtaining the best results. I believe in high ideals. I would rather a man would have a high ideal than a low ideal; and yet, after all, unless you can put your high ideal into operation, so far as practical results are concerned, you might as well not have it.

It is all well enough to say that we want State-wide prohibition or Nation-wide prohibition, but the practical question is, How are you going to bring about temperance in the highest degree?

So far as the District of Columbia is concerned, I personally would like to see the saloon abolished. I think it is an unmixed evil, but I doubt very much whether even here a law abolishing the sale of intoxicating liquors could be enforced in a city of this size if a very large proportion of the people do not favor the law.

It is just one of those laws that is most difficult to administer against public sentiment. I should like to see the question submitted in some way to the responsible people of the District, and if a majority of the people of the District favor prohibition, prohibition ought to be put into operation. Then you would have a condition of public sentiment that would enable us to measurably enforce the law.

I think a better way to deal with this question probably would be to appoint a commission to study the subject between now and the next meeting of Congress and see exactly what the situation is in this District, ascertain, if they can, the state of sentiment, and be prepared to report to us a method by which the question can be submitted to the people of the District. That is the way to legislate. It is not wise to legislate upon any question in this haphazard way of introducing a bill as a rider upon an appropriation bill without any committee consideration, without any facts. So, Mr. President, I shall vote against suspending the rules.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I have just a word to say. I shall vote for suspending the rules, and in doing so I shall be governed largely by the considerations which govern the Senator from Utah against suspending the rules. I shall be governed mostly by the fact that this is an effort to do in an orderly way what we have been heretofore doing in a disorderly way; in other words, there is no question at all of the fact that it has become a practice of the Senate to suspend the rules by a majority vote of the Senate. Time after time the Chair rules, under the rules, that an amendment is not in order; time after time by a majority vote of the Senate the Senate rules that it is in order, when the Senate very well knows that under the rules it is not in order. That is a suspension of the rules in a disorderly way; this is an attempted suspension of the rules in an orderly way. Therefore, in the interest of good order in the Senate, I shall vote for the suspension.

Any Senator voting on this particular matter before the Senate does not thereby indicate in any way what his vote may or may not be when the amendment is properly, and in order, brought before the Senate. The discussion in the last two days has turned not upon the question before the Senate, but upon the question of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas, which has not yet been decided to be in order, namely, prohibition in the District of Columbia. Of course, I think perhaps it is proper for that discussion to take place, in view of the importance of the subject. We can try to set it aside if we like, but the question of prohibition is before the people of the United States. I think in that sense it is right that it should come before the Members of this body.

Without expressing any indication one way or the other as to what my attitude shall be upon the main question, if it shall be decided by the Senate to allow the amendment to be proposed, I shall content myself with saying that, for the reasons stated, I shall vote for the adoption of the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, when the question was presented whether or not a two-thirds vote was necessary to suspend a rule of the Senate, I voted against it, because there is no such requirement in the rules themselves. If the question were directly presented as to whether or not the rules should be amended in that respect, I should support an amendment requiring two-thirds in order to suspend a rule of the Senate; but here, in an orderly and proper way, the question is directly presented whether or not the rule shall be suspended temporarily for the purpose of allowing the Senate to vote upon this particular question.

One great trouble about this rule is that the Senate itself has not respected the rule. It has often set it aside and willfully violated it for the very purpose of bringing about legislation that was in direct violation of its terms. It would be a good deal better for the Senate to suspend the rule than to violate it. Whatever may be said by the Senator from Utah, it is undoubtedly true, as stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, that in the past, whenever the Senate desired to pass any particular legislation by attaching it to an appropriation bill, it has done so openly in violation of the rule.

This is a case, Mr. President, of the greatest importance. It involves a vital question affecting the interests of the people not only of the District of Columbia but of the whole country. If there ever was a valid reason for the suspension of the rule, this seems to be a case where that might properly be done.

I have listened with a good deal of surprise to the discussion of this question by the Senator from Utah. He has advanced that worn-out argument that legislation of this kind ought not to be passed because the law, when enacted, can not be enforced. Well, Mr. President, you might just as well insist that we should not pass a law making it a crime to commit murder or burglary or larceny, because those laws are only partially enforced. Murders are still committed and other crimes that are prohibited by law are committed. The fact that a law is not properly enforced by the administrative or executive officers is no argument against the passage of a proper law.

The Senator says that he believes in local option and that where the people themselves vote a measure of this kind it may reasonably be expected that it will be enforced. But what is the condition in Maine, where the Senator charges the law is not enforced? It was voted by the people of that State just the same as a law may be passed affecting a certain locality; and yet he arraigns the people of Maine as being a lawless people, not obeying the law, not enforcing it, although voted by them; and he therefore insists that we ought not to pass a law of this kind affecting the District of Columbia.

But, Mr. President, this proposed amendment is not a law affecting a whole State; it does not provide for State-wide prohibition. It affects only a small territory, where the people themselves are not authorized by law to vote upon it at all. It is a responsibility that rests upon Congress itself, and it is for Congress to determine whether or not a law of this kind ought to be enacted

It may be said that provision should be made for the people of this District voting upon this question; but that would require us to enact laws providing for all of the machinery of elections to be held in the District, and it is decidedly impracticable, it seems to me, to attempt to secure a vote of the people upon this question. Why is it, Mr. President, that it should be insisted that in dealing with this small locality, covering 10 miles square of territory, directly under the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, we should not pass a law because State-wide prohibition has not been successfully enforced? As I said the other day, certainly the Government of the United States can enforce a law of this kind within the District of Columbia. It is a sad commentary upon the power of a Government of this kind if that can not be done.

I am a believer in prohibition; I think the time has come in this country when the people themselves are demanding it all over the country. I do not question the motives of those who believe in local option; I have no doubt of the entire sincerity of purpose of the Senator from Utah, who looks upon this matter quite differently from myself. I think his position is entirely illogical; I do not question his motives, but I do question his judgment with respect to it.

I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in discussing the matter any further. I only wanted to refer to this particular position taken by the Senator from Utah, which I think is exceedingly weak and entirely inconsistent and illogical as applied to conditions that exist in the District of Columbia and the legislation that we are now proposing to pass.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I regret very much that during the sessions that the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] has been before the Senate for discussion I have, on account of important hearings before the Committee on Agriculture, been compelled to be absent from the Senate. I do not, therefore, know what arguments have been made against the pending motion. I learn, however, that no Senator has attempted to defend either the drinking habit or the open saloon, and that the main arguments have been made against a proposition of offering important legislation on an appropriation bill, and also that it is contrary to the provisions of our rules to permit the consideration of the proposed amendment by less than a two-thirds vote.

I am exceedingly sorry that anyone should object to the consideration of so important a measure as this for the reasons I have named. The Members of this body should be permitted to dispose of this proposed amendment by a majority vote, and that can be done if no Senator will object to its consideration. While I am in full accord with those who advance the argument that it is important and necessary for a legislative body to adopt rules that will protect the minority as well as the majority, I want to remind Senators that the rules of the Senate will permit the consideration of the proposed amendment if no Senator will object, but will give his consent to an agreement that the amendment shall be taken up for a vote. I therefore hope that no Senator will object, but will give us an opportunity to dispose of the question by a direct vote. If a majority of the Members of the Senate believe that prohibition is a good thing, they will vote for it; on the other hand, if a majority believe that it is a bad thing, they will vote against it.

The argument advanced by certain Senators that the President might veto this appropriation bill if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas should be incorporated in the bill is no argument at all. I know of no greater opportunity we could give our President than the privilege of approving a provision that would abolish the saloon in the District of Columbia. To my mind, sir, it would be an opportunity as great, if not greater, than that afforded the immortal President Lincoln. The abolishment of the saloon from the District of Columbia, the Capital of this great Nation, would make it the clean city we have heard so much about in the discussions of the provisions of this bill; it would make it an ideal clean city both from a moral and physical standpoint; it would afford a test whether it is possible for the Government of the United States to abolish the saloon and dispense with the liquor traffic. All seem to agree that the saloon and the liquor traffic are great evils, and we have no right to say that these evils can not be abolished until we have made an honest effort to put prohibition into effect. I believe, sir, that we can abolish the saloon and that a prohibition law can be enforced. The emancipation of millions of American men and women from this curse would, in my judgment, be a greater and a more humane act than the emancipation of the black man from slavery.

This is a question so great that it overshadows all other questions; it concerns every locality and every city and hamlet of every nation in the civilized world. In our own country the men at the head of great corporations engaged in the industrial pursuits have been among the first to realize that liquor destroys the efficiency of men. It may be true that a small percentage of our people have the intellectual capacity and the physical strength to control their appetites and moderately use liquor so that it will not destroy them; but what about the millions of our people and the hundreds of millions yet unborn who perhaps will not be endowed with intelligence and blessed with sufficient strength to control their appetites? We all realize that we are not living for ourselves alone, and what is done to best preserve the rights and the welfare of a majority of the human family is the best thing for us all.

The State which I have the honor in part to represent has never had a legalized saloon within its borders since it became a State. While some of the very best citizens of our State are opposed to prohibition, a large majority of our people believe in it as religiously as they believe in a living God. Prohibition with us is a condition and not a theory, because the prohibition law has been on the statute books for more than a quarter of a century, and while it is true that liquor has been sold in violation of law it will not be said by any fair-minded man that the law at any time has been ineffective. And to-day, sir, not a single place can be found within the borders of our State where liquor is being sold as a beverage.

After the enabling act was passed by Congress authorizing the inhabitants of that portion of the Territory of Dakota which is now North Dakota to become a State a constitutional convention was called and after full deliberation and discussion the draft of a constitution was submitted to the people of that State. In that constitution article 20, section 217, provides:

ARTICLE 20—PROHIBITION.

SEC. 217. No person, association, or corporation shall within this State manufacture for sale or gift any intoxicating liquors, and no person, association, or corporation shall import any of the same for sale or gift or keep or sell or offer the same for sale or gift, barter, or trade as a beverage. The legislative assembly shall by law prescribe regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of this article and shall thereby provide suitable penalties for the violation thereof.

The provision for prohibition met with much opposition, but a majority of the people voted for it, and it was adopted as a part of our constitution on the 1st day of October, 1889. I venture the statement that, although this section of our constitution has often been bitterly attacked, the time will never come when the people of that great State will permit it to be repealed.

A great deal has been said by those who oppose prohibition about the "blind pigs" and "bootleggers" who operate in a prohibition State. North Dakota has had her share of trouble with that lawless, criminal class of people who will knowingly and openly violate the law. At first it seemed almost an impossibility to be able to subdue the liquor traffic, and that condition prevailed until a statute was enacted giving the courts the power to enforce the prohibitory law by imposing a penalty of imprisonment as well as a fine. Just so long as those who were willing to offend against the law could escape by the imposition of a fine there were among the criminal classes those who would take the chance, but since we strengthened our laws and provided for imprisonment as well as a fine we have no trouble in enforcing the law. Men have been sent to the penitentiary in my State for violation of the prohibition law, and just as soon as the law began to be enforced in this way the "blind piggers" left our State.

I stand here to testify that the prohibition law has been effective and a great blessing to the people of our State. We constantly have to meet the argument that prohibition does not prohibit. I am here, sir, to testify that prohibition, properly enforced, does prohibit.

North Dakota was almost a wilderness when we adopted this law. The resources of that State were undeveloped. The inhabitants were financially poor. The inhabitants of the Territory of that day were mainly composed of young men and young women who had come from different portions of the United States, physically and mentally strong and morally clean. They were determined to set up an empire where the people should not be destroyed by the liquor traffic. The saloons that had been built during Territorial days, whether on the hillside or in the valley, were changed to places of legitimate and honorable business; and to-day, sir, that Territory, which at that time was almost a barren waste, has progressed as no other country has progressed, and in the place of the saloon we have built tabernacles of worship and modern educational institutions.

We were told that we were too poor to eliminate the liquor traffic. We were told that we must have the license in order to maintain the dignity and protect the people in our cities. For more than 25 years not a dollar has been paid into the treasury of any city or hamlet as a license fee; and yet, for its size, nowhere in this great country will you find better managed cities, better regulated cities, better and cleaner cities than will be found in our State.

We were told that it would bankrupt our State to do away with the license system. On the contrary, we can show that no agricultural State has made more rapid advancement, more rapid progress, than has our State. Our State is yet in its infancy, but our population has grown from 177,000 to about 700,000. Our resources to-day, on an assessed valuation, are more than $1,250,000,000. Our valuation per capita is greater than that of any other agricultural State—more than $2,000 for every man, woman, and child. Our educational institutions have been built up. We have to-day as many pupils in the public schools as we had inhabitants when our State was first admitted as a State. We expend annually more than $5,000,000 in our public schools, and we have a fund of more than $70,000,000 for the higher educational institutions of our State. So, from an economic standpoint, I ask you, Has prohibition hurt the State of North Dakota or the people of that State? It must be remembered that that wealth has been dug out of the earth by good and honest labor. Our wealth has not been amassed by speculation and gambling. Every dollar has been taken from the soil.

Prohibition is practical. We have the opportunity now to manumit the people of the District of Columbia from the greatest evil and the worst slavery that exists among men; and I, for one, shall vote to do it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I received to-day a letter dated Greenville, S. C., January 17, 1915. A gentleman whom I do not know says:

Senator MARTINE: Read the inclosed articles in to-day's Atlanta Journal. Prohibition is a fake and farce in Atlanta. There are now 180 saloons—licensed—that sell any brand of beer you ask for—Schlitz; Pabst; Budweiser; Ehrets, of New York; Houcks, of Cincinnati; Perfect Brew, of Baltimore; and 25 other beers from different cities. These beers are all 4 per cent alcoholic strength and over. There are also about 30 clubs that sell you any brand of whisky and beer you ask for The same condition exists in Savannah and Augusta, Ga. If you will send some reliable man here to look up this subject he will verify the statement I have made.

Prohibition in Georgia is a joke. Any stranger can get a 10-day card in any club, and when it runs out can have it renewed.

I am sending you this information as the true conditions. I am a traveling man, and have visited the saloons and clubs often in past months, including yesterday.

Yours, very truly. CHARLES S. SIMMONS.

I do not know the gentleman. Then I clipped from the Washington Post of January 17 an interview with another gentleman, a Mr. Mattingly, of Atlanta, Ga., and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that will be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"A striking example of the declaration that prohibition does not prohibit was shown in Atlanta, Ga., on New Year's eve," said Ralph Mattingly, of that city, at the New Willard. "Atlanta is supposed to be a dry town, with a State-wide prohibition law on the statute books, yet on the date mentioned the police made more than 500 arrests for drunkenness. I venture to say that in the city of Greater New York there were not that many persons held for drunkenness.

"There are no open barrooms in Atlanta, to be sure, but there are dozens of places where drinks of any kind can be obtained. I know of at least nine clubs in the down-town section of Atlanta where drinks can be obtained, and many men are members of all these clubs. The extraordinary number of arrests on New Year's eve caused the mayor, who is not a sympathizer with the prohibitionists, I understand, to write a special message to the council recommending that stricter regulations be thrown about the serving of drinks in clubs, and particularly suggesting that women should not be served unless accompanied by a relative.

"The New Year's violations of the law doubtless will lead to a campaign on the part of the prohibitionists for the stricter enforcement of the law, but there is no chance of stamping out the consumption of intoxicants, and a nation-wide prohibition law, in my judgment, would only lead to an increase in the number of lawbreakers.

"Several years ago I believed prohibition could be enforced, but the late Senator Money, who himself had been an ardent prohibitionist, convinced me that it was impossible. The Senator had made a long and scientific study of the liquor question, and he came to the conclusion that legislation can not cure the drink evil."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no doubt that the gentlemen who are making this strenuous contest in this direction are prompted by honest and laudable motives. I know them, and I believe they are; but, as I said a day or two ago, I believe they are mistaken. How can the statements made by the distinguished gentlemen on that side of the question stand, in the face of the fact——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. THOMAS. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado will state his point of order.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from New Jersey has already spoken twice upon the pending question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think that is a mistake. I have spoken once; but, in Heaven's name, if you are going to pull that rule on me, the Senator from Colorado has violated it a hundred times.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Colorado insists upon his point of order, the Chair sustains it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Is the point of order sustained, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; it has been the same legislative day for three calendar days, and the Senator from New Jersey has spoken three times on this question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire to ask the privilege to have printed in the RECORD, from page 210 of the Internal Revenue Report for 1914, a statement of the internal-revenue taxes received from the State of Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Revenues—Georgia.

Rectifiers	$300.00
Retail liquor dealers	28,857.14
Wholesale liquor dealers	3,037.50
Manufacturers of stills	16.67
Stills or worms manufactured	20.00
Brewers	600.00
Retail dealers in malt liquors	10,215.03
Wholesale dealers in malt liquors	2,872.91
Retail dealers in oleomargarine artificially colored in imitation of butter	48.00

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this debate, especially along lines which are probably not germane to the direct question before the Senate. I must, however, challenge the statements that have been made during this debate, that the prohibition laws of Tennessee have proved a failure, especially in the cities of Memphis and Nashville. The Senators who have made these statements are misinformed. For years I held an official position in Tennessee which gave me ample opportunity to observe the manner in which these laws were enforced, and I know that they have not failed in their purposes. They have stopped the sale of intoxicating beverages in at least 92 counties out of the 96 into which our State is divided, and have very largely reduced the traffic and consequent evil resulting in the other 4 counties.

These laws are doubtless sometimes violated in every county of the State, but not more than other laws for the suppression and punishment of crime which are on the statute books. All criminal laws are violated sometimes. Even those against homicide are violated, but no one has ever said that they should be repealed on that account. The prohibition laws are as rigidly and successfully enforced as any of our criminal laws. The judges of our courts are able and conscientious, and do their duty without fear or favor; the district attorneys and other officers are men of high character and efficiency, and our juries are composed of intelligent men, and all criminal laws are enforced.

I can not deny that the sale of intoxicating beverages has not been entirely suppressed in Nashville and Memphis or that the temperance laws have at times been flagrantly violated in these cities. This, however, is not the fault of the laws, nor does it meet with the approval of the better class of the people of these cities. The majority of the people of Nashville and Memphis are as highly educated, refined, and law-abiding as those of any city in the country. The only fault I can find with them is they do not give that attention to the nomination and election of officers they ought to do in order to secure the best government. The fault is in the officers whose duty it is to enforce these laws. It grows out of their inefficiency and unfaithfulness or want of courage to do their duty.

The great majority of the people of the State approve these laws, and they mean to and will enforce them. Gov. Thomas C. Rye, an able and courageous man, was elected governor upon a platform declaring for the maintenance and enforcement of the temperance laws of Tennessee by a majority of over 20,000. In his inaugural address he declared that he would keep his platform pledges, and that these laws should be vigorously enforced and obeyed in every county in the State. He further declared that if the machinery we now have is insufficient for that purpose he would favor the enactment of such further laws as might be needed.

The great majority of the general assembly were elected upon the same platform and are in full sympathy with the governor. The personnel of this body is of unusual intelligence and ability, there being among them quite a number of the ablest lawyers of the State. Bills have already been introduced to carry out the platform pledges providing, among other things, for the removal of all unfaithful and inefficient officers, and reported for passage.

Knowing Gov. Rye and the members of the general assembly as I do, their ability, integrity, and loyalty to their pledges and to the people of the State, I have no doubt these bills will be enacted into law.

When the people of the State elect a Governor by a majority of 20,000 over a strong and popular opponent, and a general assembly upon a platform declaring in unmistakable terms for the maintenance and enforcement of a law, and when the governor of that State in his inaugural address declares he will keep his platform pledges, and the members of the general assembly promptly introduce bills to carry out the platform pronouncements, it can not be said that that law is a failure. On the contrary, it must be conceded that the people of the State favor it and have determined that it shall be enforced. The people of Tennessee, not the prohibitionists alone, recognized that the open saloons were hotbeds and nurseries of immorality and political corruption and are determined to drive them from the State, and they are going to do it. The laws they have enacted for this purpose, like all other new laws, require some time for adjustment, but they can be and will be enforced. It is only a matter of time. The people of Tennessee believe in law enforcement, and they will not allow any law to be repealed at the behest of those who violate it. They have never in peace or war failed to do their duty, and they will not in this case. It is now as much a question of good citizenship and whether the laws of the State can be defied and trampled upon by the lawless element as it is that intoxicating liquors shall not be sold. I have no doubt of the ultimate success and enforcement of the temperance laws of Tennessee, and deny all assertions that they or any other law can not be enforced in my State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the report of the Committee on Rules, which reports favorably the temporary suspension of the rule against offering an amendment proposing general legislation to an appropriation bill? The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] who does not seem to be in the Chamber. I therefore withhold my vote. If privileged to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LODGE] is detained from the Chamber to-day on account of illness, and has requested me to state that if he were present he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. MCCUMBER's name was called). I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] is unavoidably absent, and that he is paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. O'GORMAN's name was called). I have been requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] on account of illness in his family.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and in his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I inquire whether the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a pair with that Senator, and on that account I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. I am informed that we are in accord upon this proposition, and I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I have been unable to procure a transfer of that pair. I must therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, a point of order. I think under the rule, it being a vote requiring two-thirds, the Senator will have to transfer to two. It requires two-thirds to carry the report.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It would be the other way about.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I have been requested to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. He is paired with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. If the Senator from West Virginia were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have been requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is detained at home on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. CATRON. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FALL], who is detained on account of serious illness in his family, and he has been detained for some time by that cause.

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 40, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. So the Senate does not concur in the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. JONES. In connection with this matter I ask to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. William T. Haines, governor of Maine, on the question "The Maine law; or, does prohibition prohibit."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the subject is not now up for consideration, and I object.

Mr. JONES. I merely thought that I would put in this address in connection with the vote just had.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the subject were under consideration by the Senate, I would not object. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and myself have agreed to object to the publication of any matter in the RECORD which does not relate to a subject under consideration by the Senate.

Mr. JONES. It is to help in the future, and I think it is important.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the objection of the Senator from Georgia is too late and the matter will have to go into the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. All right.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE MAINE LAW; OR, DOES PROHIBITION PROHIBIT?

[By Hon. William T. Haines, governor of Maine.]

Ladies and gentlemen, I am invited to address the national convention of the Antisaloon League of America, whose sole object is the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors and reduction of the evils flowing therefrom. I consider this a marked honor, and only regret that I am so situated that I can not be present at your convention; but I am handing what I have to say to the Rev. Wilbur F. Berry, of Waterville, Me., who will be in attendance upon the convention, and have asked him to read the same for me.

I have taken for my subject "The Maine law; or, Does prohibition prohibit?" By this I mean the law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in my State, and what I have to say will pertain to my own State principally, with a few suggestions which I have to offer.

Maine was noted in its early history for inebriety. We were referred to by the early writers as "a race of drunkards." Rum was one of the principal articles of traffic. Our people were early engaged in navigation, particularly with the West India Islands. We sold them lumber and pickled fish. We took in exchange sugar, molasses, and West India rum, and the early commerce of the State is especially marked with the last-named product. If you were to examine the accounts kept by any of the country stores—and, in fact, all of the stores of the State prior to 1840—you would note in the charges made to the various customers, about every fourth item, "W. I. goods." I have examined a good many sets of old account books, and they all read the same. The subsistence of the average family consisted of very few items—salt pork, salt codfish, flour, and Indian meal, with the home-produced vegetables, milk, and butter, but to the family expense was added the inevitable item, "W. I. goods," or West India rum. It was cheap—almost free. There was no license fee to sell it and no internal revenue charged upon it by the Federal Government. All stores and taverns sold it. The State was large and taverns were frequent. There were no railroads and goods were moved by team very long distances, and the stopping places were at these taverns. Every night saw the same round of drunkenness in the old-time barroom.

In 1830 we had 13 distilleries of our own; 500 licensed dealers, with only 400,000 people; and we imported 300,000 gallons of intoxicating liquors annually. It is estimated that we had at that date 10,000 habitual drunkards, the most of them heads of families. There were 2,000 grog shops in the State—1 to every 225 persons. In a single town of 1,200 population we had as high as 17 rum shops reported, where 10,000 gallons of liquor were sold annually.

While the most marked thing about the State in these early days was poverty, it was estimated that at least $12,000,000—at the very low prices for which intoxicating liquors were then sold—was spent annually for them by our people, or about $20 per capita.

In 1834 a few of the leading men of the State became frightened at the situation. A State temperance society was formed of which one of the governors was president, and Chief Justice Mellen, of our supreme court, was elected as his successor. The traffic was pronounced immoral, and a fight for better conditions was begun. Soon afterwards Judge Shepley, of our supreme court, and nine other leading men presented a petition to the legislature announcing the doctrine that "the sale of intoxicating liquors is either right or wrong. If right, the law by license should not make it a monopoly. If not right, it should not be sanctioned by law." "That by legalizing the traffic and authorizing a revenue from it, such laws tend to encourage the sale and use of such drinks and hold out a temptation to produce a town income from a source adverse to the moral interests of the community."

Various kinds of local and State license laws pertaining to innholders were passed from time to time for the next 20 years, all of little force and effect, but the agitation went constantly on, supported by the right-minded and far-seeing people of the State, creating a sentiment for the suppression of this traffic.

The first prohibitory law was passed in 1846, but it did not give the right of search and seizure, and it was not until 1851 that the first real prohibitory law was enacted. It was signed by Gov. Hubbard, a Democrat, who was reported to like his toddy altogether too well, but who had respect enough for the will of the people not to veto this statute, as it was expected he would do.

The row now began in earnest, with the late Gen. Neal Dow, commander in chief of the forces of prohibition on the one side, and the devil, with all the rum sellers and bums of the State on the other. The latter organization has remained intact to date, and I regret to say the most of the time they have had the assistance of the organization of the Democratic Party in our State, aided in later years by the United States Whisky Trust and the National Brewers' Association, which are now in complete control, or think they are, of the Democratic Party in Maine; but I must add that there are thousands of honest and right-minded Democrats in my State who refuse to follow this trust.

Lest I may be accused of partisanship in this discussion, I want to say also that the Republican Party, which in Maine, during the past 50 years, has stood for the principles of our prohibitory law, has grossly failed in its administration and enforcement many, many times. While it has had control of the State for over 50 years, with the exception of two administrations, one of one year and one of two years—one a fusion of Democrats and Greenbackers, in 1881; the other a fusion of Demorcats and the Whiskey Trust in 1911—it, the Republican Party, has many times been much more interested in the question of which would furnish the more votes—the churches or the rum shops—than in the suppression of drinking houses and tippling shops.

Uninfluenced by party politics, there never has been a time since 1858—when the question was referred to the people whether the "license law of 1856" or "An act of 1858 for the suppression of drinking houses and tippling shops" should be the future policy of the State—when there has been a question but what the sentiment of the majority of the people was in favor of what is popularly known as our "Maine law." For many years the Democratic Party of the State, in conventions assembled, declared it a sumptuary law. They insisted that it interfered with personal liberty. This question was finally fought out in the courts, even to the Supreme Court of the United States, which declared in favor of our State having control of its own police regulations to the extent of our prohibitory statutes.

Under our system of government the sheriffs of our 16 counties, together with the county attorney in each county, are especially charged by statute with the enforcement of this law. The Maine law is complete in every particular. It provides for the punishment of a single sale—for search and seizure process, even to the dwelling house; with confiscation and destruction of liquor seized, and punishment of those in whose possession it is found. It provides for indictment of "common sellers," the "keepers of drinking houses and tippling shops," and makes a "common nuisance" of every place in which liquors are kept for sale or sold in violation of law. It provides for injunction against the owners of buildings with knowledge that they are used by tenants for the sale of liquor; and any person who goes about as a salesman from place to place, offering liquors for sale, is subject to a penalty and fine for so doing.

Now, the question is being asked, constantly, from outside the State—probably I have had 25 inquiries during the last 10 months, as governor—"Does the prohibitory law prohibit?" My answer is always "Yes." By this I do not mean that it has always prohibited in the State of Maine; or, in other words, that the law has always been enforced—neither would I say that it has ever been fully and completely enforced; nor do I undertake to say that it is possible to give a full and complete enforcement of our Maine law, however honest and faithful officers may be; and if they are not honest and faithful, it may be looked upon as a complete failure, as it has been many times in the past, not only by people outside of the State, but by people inside of the State.

Public sentiment is subject to every wind that blows, and a weak public sentiment in our State makes a weak enforcement of this law, and submits us to ridicule and disgrace, and properly charged as hypocrites, and furnishes splendid opportunity for the friends of a "license law" to have the best of the argument. But there are some special reasons for this which those outside of our State may not understand. Our location is bad. We have a long border on the north, bounded by licensed Canada, and it is very easy to get rum across our borders. On the west and south again by licensed New Hampshire, and we are only six hours by rail from the center of the State to the great whisky market of New England—Boston—whose runners are ever among us, who have the name of every citizen of the State, in catalogue order, and who flood our mails day by day to the remotest hamlet with their circulars, advertising liquors; and we are bounded on the east by the great free rum Atlantic Ocean. There is no limit to the amount that is brought to our shores concealed in vessels of different kinds, which make the stock for pocket peddlers and the lowest cowards in the business.

We have had, through the efforts of the Whisky Trust and their allies in our State, during the past 20 years a determined and persistent demand for what is popularly known as "resubmission." In 1885, in order to stop continual agitation in the legislature at each succeeding session thereof for repeal or modification of the prohibitory law, Gen. Neal Dow succeeded in getting an amendment to the constitution forever prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor in our State except for medicinal and mechanical purposes, submitted to the people for their approval or disapproval. It was voted on and approved and become a part of our fundamental law.

For about 10 years the question remained quiet, and the statutes were partially enforced. Then the new cry for resubmission increased in volume as the years went by, until 1911, when the claim became so strong for the young men of the State who had never had a chance to express themselves upon this question, that the legislature yielded and again submitted it to the people, or resubmitted it. Then the Rum Trust thought they had us. The Democratic Party was in power for the first time in 30 years in our State. They had the governor and both branches of the legislature, and their long-dreamed-of ambition to rid the State of the hateful prohibitory law seemed to be theirs in accomplishment. The day the "yes" and "no" vote was taken every would-be saloon keeper; a few hotel men who wanted to make the whisky trade the principal feature of their business; every thug and low-down citizen living in our State who would have been members of the "nether-world" population had they lived in the big cities; the keepers of houses of ill fame—all under the leadership of men who called themselves statemen, and assumed control of the Democratic Party, supplied with all the money that they could use by the brewers' association and Whisky Trust of the Nation, on the one side, with the churches, supported by the mothers and wives and backed by the honest business men and our great farming population, with its natural and clean discernment of right and wrong and good hard-headed common sense, on the other side made up the contending forces. Much to the surprise of everybody, the right had a small majority. The "no" won by less than 800 votes, but there never was a greater triumph for right and virtue against vice and crime than in this contest. The Republican Party as an organization had nothing to do with it. It was the Democracy, as organized and led in this State, against the people.

I think we have a right to assume that for awhile there will be no further claims made for the repeal of our "Maine law." Yet we have a certain line of newspapers in the State which claim to be in support of the present administration at Washington that are constantly claiming and declaring that "Prohibition does not prohibit." They seldom fail to let a day pass that they don't have an article to this effect. While the jails and prisons, under the present administration in our State, with fairly good enforcement, have only about one-half the inmates as a result of intoxication as compared with the number during a previous two years of nonenforcement, every time there is any crime as a result of drunkenness in the State it is advertised widely, with an invariable comment attached that "Prohibition does not prohibit."

In my inaugural address, delivered in January last, I appealed to all of the newspapers of the State, irrespective of party, "to help in creating a public sentiment against rum selling and rum drinking. It can do more to help or more to hinder in this cause than any other influence in the State." These papers saw the point, and have since done everything they can "to hinder in this cause."

I am trying to state the exact situation as I see it in our State and the causes of it. I may seem to have a partisan bias, but the people who live here know I am telling the truth. Several causes are making to-day in Maine for the enforcement of the prohibitory law, perhaps a little better than it was ever enforced before. First, I place the nonenforcement of the previous two years' administration, during which there was almost practically no enforcement in the State and the people got the nearest to an object lesson of what free rum means of anything they have had for half a century, and we are all under a great obligation to Gov. Plaisted and his administration for this splendid object lesson. The next is the fact that the business men of the State have at last come to the conclusion that a legal business is better than an illegal business, and the men who wish to do a legal business are disgusted with the men who wish to do an illegal business, especially with their presumption or assumption of the control of the political affairs of the State. The grocer and dry goods man, especially the retailer, who is dependent upon popular sentiment for his trade and is naturally timid, now thoroughly believe that they have better business and make more money when the laboring man takes home his pay check to his wife without interference or being waylaid by the rum seller on the way. The contractor and builder find with the enforcement of the "Maine law" a full crew on Monday morning, ready to go to work, with their heads clear and their hands steady. The doctor is no longer telling patients that alcohol is a good remedy. If from no other source, he has had it clearly demonstrated to him by the lectures of that distinguished naval officer, Capt. HOBSON, that the great destroyer of the white corpuscles, or life itself, is the great warrior John Barleycorn. The bankers and economists of our State have only to look at our bank reports to find that with a population of only about 742,000 people we have assets in our 48 savings banks, 44 trust companies, and 37 loan and building associations amounting to $165,784,505, or an average of about $224 for every inhabitant of the State, which is something of an argument that "prohibition does prohibit." Two hundred and thirty-three thousand one hundred and fifty-nine people in our State have deposits in our savings banks averaging $401. The gain in our savings bank deposits annually for the past 10 years has been about $6,500,000, running from four to eleven millions each year. These figures are something of an argument in favor of the "Maine law." It is estimated that we shall take from people living outside of the State during the present year for entertainment on our seashore and inland lakes, through our railroads, hotels, cottages, boarding houses, guides, summer schools, and other ways in which we serve a foreign population annually with our scenery, seacoast, fish, and game over $50,000,000. The Whisky Trust advocates have strenuously insisted that we could not maintain this business with an enforcement of the prohibitory law, but I am pleased to report that the proprietor of the largest hotel in the city of Portland, the largest city in our State and which is coming to be considered our largest summer resort point, told me in August that his hotel had broken all records for guests; also that Portland has had probably the best season for summer business that it has ever had, and this with the most strenuous enforcement of the prohibitory law it has had for years.

After I became governor, in January last, complaints were made from five counties that the sheriffs of those counties were not enforcing the law; that they were standing for nullification. Three were Democrats and two were Republicans. I submitted the one in Cumberland County to the legislature for impeachment, intending to submit the others as soon as I had a little more evidence, but the legislature, anticipating my purpose, immediately commenced impeachment proceedings against all of them. Three were tried and impeached, one resigned, and the other hunted up a case of smallpox and had himself exposed to it, and then he got in league with our board of health and got a certificate that there was some danger of his having smallpox, and the legislature adjourned without hearing his case. Rum sellers without smallpox are bad enough, but a sheriff who protected them was too much for a Maine Legislature.

I appointed successors in these places under pledges to enforce the prohibitory law, and I believe they have done so faithfully and honestly and to the best of their ability and against great opposition in their several localities. I am pleased to report, however, that this enforcement is now popular with the masses of the people. Every honest man likes it, irrespective of the political party to which he belongs. There is a political machine in these different counties fighting enforcement the best it can in every way possible, but they are losing ground. The mayor of Portland recently, upon the sudden death of Sheriff Scully, of that county, in the interim of the appointment of his successor of seven days, changed his heretofore publicly announced policy of doing nothing to assist in the enforcement of the prohibitory law in the city of Portland, at the request of strong public sentiment, and ordered his police force to enforce this law until the successor to Sheriff Scully was appointed and confirmed.

Bangor, in Penobscot County, which for many years has had the distinction of having the "Bangor plan," and from which was removed a Republican sheriff by the legislature for failure to do his duty, and another Republican appointed in his place, who is doing his duty fearlessly and without favor, is fast becoming a strong temperance locality. It is the county seat of the second county in the State. It is the metropolis of eastern Maine. It does a large wholesaling business, and its business men are among the brightest and most enterprising in the State. There is not a day passes that I do not receive some evidence of their satisfaction with and approval of the enforcement of the "Maine law" in that county, Bangor included. They see the point as business men. It is dollars and cents to every one of them, not looking in some way, directly or indirectly, from the profits of the sale of liquor.

In many of our counties there is practically no liquor sold, and but few or none in the jails as a result.

Now, this is the situation in Maine, as I see it and understand it. Of course, there is much more that I might add, but let me reassure you all that the "Maine law" in Maine is prohibiting and preventing the sale and use of intoxicating liquors, and there is no reason why it should not continue to do so more and more as the years go on; but it must be remembered that the personal liberty or privilege of no citizen has ever been interfered with. Every man is at liberty to have all the liquor he wishes come for his own private use from outside of the State, and many people have it. Some, perhaps, to whom it does no apparent harm—many to whom it does a great deal of harm, but as long as it is made and the right remains to ship it into our State, it will continue to come here and be used. That does not mean in any way that "prohibition does not prohibit," and there is less and less of this done every year.

In closing, I want to offer just one suggestion, and it is with reference to this particular matter. As long as the United States Government continues to collect a revenue for the sale and dealing in liquors, so long as they permit it shipped into the different States under interstate-commerce laws, so long as the United States mails are permitted to carry circulars and advertisements to every citizen in our State from every brewer and distiller, just so long will we have the condition in our State upon which the Whisky Trust will base their continuing claims that the "Maine law" is a failure or that "prohibition does not prohibit."

The Federal tax now collected for the manufacture and sale of liquors was put on as a necessity of war. Why continue it? The fact that the Federal Government licenses the sale of liquor and the State prohibits it makes a dual situation between the two Governments over the same people. They are inconsistent, and one or the other is right or wrong. They can't be both right and wrong. Why should the mails carry advertisements for liquor sellers any more than for lottery-ticket venders.

We permit the one and prohibit the other. Which is the greater evil? This is a question for Congress to consider, and in the very near future. We may need an amendment to the Constitution, as suggested by Gov. Baldwin in a recent address, to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors by the Federal Government, but we don't need any amendment to repeal the internal-revenue tax on liquors or to prohibit the carrying of liquor advertisements in the mail, and such a law would take the Federal Government out of copartnership with the whisky and beer trusts. Nothing would strengthen the hands of the State more than such legislation.

While I have referred to political parties and politicians freely in this paper, describing the situation in Maine, and the history of this law to some extent, I want to say that it is the greatest satisfaction to feel that we have two great Democrats in the Nation, and the first two in the land to-day—President Wilson and Secretary Bryan—who we all feel are on the moral side of this great question and can be depended upon to sustain the cause of prohibition, independent of the mandates of their party, even, if it ever comes to an issue of that kind, and there is no one for whom all lovers of law and order have greater respect than for that celebrated Democrat who has done so much to place the evils of alcohol before the American people, Capt. HOBSON.

This question is fast going beyond the bounds of party politics, and the party or the man who in the future is allied with the whisky or brewery interests in this country is bound ultimately to receive the condemnation of a fast-increasing intelligence and understanding, coupled with a keener sense of morality and justice, which will be given expression to by the American ballot.

EXPORTATION OF MUNITIONS OF WAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, in further response to a resolution of December 7, 1914, a memorandum showing the exports of domestic cartridges, gunpowder, and firearms from the United States to specified countries during the month of November, 1914, which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed. (S. Doc. No. 660, pt. 2.)

CREDENTIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the credentials of PAUL O. HUSTINGS, chosen by the electors of the State of Wisconsin a Senator from that State for the term of six years beginning March 4, 1915, which were read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Oregon, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of munitions of war, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Oregon, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Oregon, remonstrating against the transfer of postal clerks to the Railway Mail Service, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Oregon, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to exclude anti-Catholic publications from the mails, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. PAGE presented the petition of Mrs. F. W. Nash, State superintendent of antinarcotics of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Burlington, Vt., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Philippine bill to prohibit the sale of intoxicating drinks and drugs in those islands except for medicinal purposes, which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may at this time give notice of a proposed amendment to Rule XL, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Utah gives notice that he will move to amend Rule XL as follows:

On line 4 of said rule, as printed on page 37 of the Rules and Manual, United States Senate, after the word "thereof," insert a semicolon and the following:

And a motion to suspend any rule or any part thereof shall require a vote of two-thirds, and shall be decided without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will lie over under the rule.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. ROBINSON introduced a bill (S. 7328) granting a pension to Virginia F. Sawyer, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ASHURST submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $175,000 for beginning the construction of a dam and necessary controlling works for diverting water from the Gila River at a site above Florence, Ariz., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 20150), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia, to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the rivers and harbors appropriation bill (H. R. 20189), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19422) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the Government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes.

Mr. KERN. I wish to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the parliamentary situation to be that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is pending.

Mr. KERN. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the question to be disposed of. The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

Mr. POMERENE's amendment was to add to the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 1608 j. That said jury shall assess, as benefits accruing by reason of said opening, extension, widening, or straightening, an amount equal to the amount of damages as ascertained by them as hereinbefore provided, including $5 per day for the marshal and $5 per day for each juror for the services of each when actually employed, and all other expenses of such proceedings upon each lot or part of lot or parcel of land in the square or block in which said alley or minor street is to be opened, extended, widened, or straightened, and upon each lot, part of lot, or parcel of ground in the squares or blocks confronting the square in which such alley or minor street is to be opened, extended, widened, or straightened which will be benefited by such opening, extension, widening, or straightening, in the proportion that said jury may find said lots, parts of lots, or parcels of land will be benefited: Provided, however, That wherever the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, under the foregoing provisions, shall institute proceedings for the widening or extension of any alley so as to convert said alley into a minor street through the square in which said alley is located, such an amount of the total amount of damages as ascertained by the jury, as hereinbefore provided, including $5 per day for the marshal and $5 per day for each juror for the services of each when actually employed, and all other expenses of such proceedings, shall be assessed by the said jury as benefits, and to the extent of such benefits upon each lot or parcel of land in the square or block in which such alley is to be converted into a minor street, and upon any and all other lots, pieces or parcels of land which the jury may find will be benefited by the said widening or conversion of said alley into such minor street, as the said jury may find said lots or parts of lots, places or parcels of land will be benefited; and in determining the amount to be assessed against such lots or parts of lots, pieces or parcels of land the jury shall take into consideration the respective situations and topographical conditions of such lots or parts of lots, pieces or parcels of land, and the benefits and advantages they may severally receive from the said widening or conversion of such alley into such minor street.

Mr. SMOOT. If the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is now before the Senate, I wish to say that I shall object to that amendment, that it is general legislation upon an appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If that is the reason, the Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. POMERENE. I am disposed to admit that the point of order is well taken, and necessarily if that objection is insisted upon I can not proceed with it. I expect, however, to present it in the form of a separate bill and will ask for action.

Mr. JONES. I intended to urge the Senator to permit me to make an explanation in reference to this amendment and to state the necessity for this law. I have some facts here with reference to the matter showing that it is a very imperative proposition, but after a talk with the Senator in charge of the bill, who is very anxious to proceed with the bill, and on the suggestion that if this amendment is permitted it would probably lead to the presentation of several other amendments, and with the assurance that our committee will take the matter up as a separate measure and act very promptly upon it, I shall not delay the Senate by presenting the facts that I have gathered, but will take it up before the committee in conjunction with the Senator from Ohio and seek action upon it through the action of the committee. I regret that it can not be passed on in this bill, but I recognize the parliamentary situation and shall hope for early and favorable action upon an independent measure.

Mr. KERN. I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, line 11, strike out "1886" and insert "1914," and in line 14 of the same page strike out "1904" and insert "1914."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I raise the point of order that that is new legislation. It is not estimated for.

Mr. KERN. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a palpable mistake that has been made in this section in providing that the asphalt used on the streets shall only be as good as that used prior to July 1, 1886, 29 years ago, when the asphalt business was in its infancy. I am only asking that the asphalt used shall be as good as that used up to July 1, 1914.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Why does the Senator from Maryland say that this is general legislation?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I accept the modification proposed by the Senator from Indiana if he insists upon it. I have no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There has been so much confusion that I have not yet learned what is the object of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana. I wish he would explain it briefly.

Mr. KERN. Let me read the paragraph as it now stands. After providing for certain improvements for asphalt pavement and asphalt-block pavement it reads:

Under appropriations contained in this act no contract shall be made for making or relaying asphalt pavement at a higher price than $1.80 per square yard for a quality equal to the best laid in the District of Columbia prior to July 1, 1886, and with same depth of base, nor more than $1.80 per square yard for laying standard asphalt-block pavement equal to the best laid in the District of Columbia prior to July 1, 1904.

The proposition as to the asphalt used shall be of that quality, but no better than that quality. The proposition is that that quality shall be used that was used 29 years ago, when the asphalt business was in its infancy and when there was no expensive asphalt, and that the asphalt blocks shall be no better than those used in 1904, the year when they first began to use asphalt blocks. I propose that the provision shall be amended so that the asphalt and asphalt blocks shall be as good as any used prior to July 1, 1914.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I should like to correct the statement made by the Senator. It does not say it shall be any better, but it shall be a quality equal to the best laid in the District of Columbia prior to July 1, 1886.

Mr. KERN. Used at that time.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It does not necessarily follow that it shall be better.

Mr. KERN. Let us suppose asphalt used on the street——

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JAMES. I call up the amendment I offered and ask that it be read to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That section 6 of the act of the Fifty-seventh Congress entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the general government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," be amended by striking out the word "tangible" wherever it occurs in section 6 of said act; and that the words "personal property" wherever occurring in said section shall be held to include, in addition to the specific property mentioned in said section, all moneys, credits, cash, notes, bonds, stocks, annuities, and all other kinds and forms of indebtedness.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I raise the point of order that this is new legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands it to be admitted that there is an act of Congress which provides what property shall be assessed and how it shall be assessed. Is not that correct?

Mr. JAMES. I understand that that is the state of the law at this time. I will say to the Senator having the bill in charge that I recognize that this is new legislation. I regret exceedingly that he has felt impelled to make the point of order. I think the law ought to be amended in this respect, so that the stocks, bonds, and money of the very wealthy people of the District of Columbia should pay taxes just as the ordinary citizen pays taxes on his humble home. But if the Chair thinks it is new legislation, I can not insist upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky has admitted that it is new legislation?

Mr. JAMES. Yes; I think that the point of order is well taken, I regret to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, after line 6, insert:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to construct two public bathhouses and convert portions of the tidal basin in Potomac Park into public bathing beaches, as outlined in Senate Document No. 593, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and for the beginning of such improvement the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I raise the point of order that this is new legislation in one sense; in another sense it has never been estimated for.

Mr. NORRIS. In my judgment, the amendment is not general legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair inquire of the Senator from Nebraska whether it is admitted that this is an increase of the appropriation made in the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it to carry out provisions of existing law?

Mr. NORRIS. It is not antagonistic to any existing law. There is not any law that has——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well. Has it been moved by the direction of any standing or select committee of the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it has not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Or is it in accordance with an estimate made by the head of any one of the departments?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What department is that?

Mr. NORRIS. The War Department. The Senate of the United States, on August 25, passed a resolution asking the Secretary of War to make an estimate. In Senate Document No. 593, Sixty-third Congress, second session, in response to that resolution, is the reply of the Secretary of War sent to the Senate. That is the document referred to in the amendment, and in that document, signed by the Secretary of War, he says:

The estimated cost of the above outlined project is as follows.

Then he gives an itemized estimate of the entire cost.

But, Mr. President, as I have understood the ruling of the Chair, there is another reason why the amendment is not subject to a point of order. It does not purport on its face to be general legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it is not general legislation. That is clearly true.

Mr. NORRIS. In conversations I have had with members of the committee, even members of the committee of the House, since this matter has been somewhat agitated, they have suggested that this amendment be put on the bill. I have had that suggestion made by the members of the House Committee on Appropriations, and I know that there are many members of the District Committee here who have given it consideration. On its merits there certainly can be no objection to it. I do not care to discuss the merits, because I do not want to take up the time of the Senate. I will not discuss them unless there is some objection on its merits, and then I would be glad to go into it.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator we have no knowledge of any estimate upon this proposition. There has been no estimate made. There may have been a suggestion, but there is no estimate that came before our committee or before Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will get this document which I have named, he will find the estimate.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. We have the document here.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is undoubtedly correct that the estimate of cost made by the Secretary of War is not an estimate such as our rules contemplate, yet I am going to appeal to my friend the chairman of the subcommittee to let this item go on the bill, and we will give it very careful consideration. This is, to my mind, a very desirable matter, and it may appeal to all of us that it is good legislation. I would not commit myself to what action I might take in conference over this question, but it is something that ought to be done. The condition that exists, so far as our bathing beach is concerned, is almost scandalous at the present time; and while undoubtedly, from my viewpoint, the amendment can be ruled out on a point of order, this estimate not having been correctly submitted through the Treasury Department, yet, as I said, I think it might be well to let it go on the bill for future consideration in conference.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that there are many things that probably should go on the bill that we in committee turned down, and this is a matter that did not, so far as I know, come before our committee at all. There were a great many propositions before our committee that were certainly desirable. The only question is, if you are going to start with this, there is no telling where the legislation will go. This bill has been before the Senate for nearly two weeks, and it does seem to me that we should dispose of it and not allow new legislation to be submitted here on matters that have not been estimated for in a proper way. From what I can understand, it certainly has not been properly estimated for. There is an estimate in a way of the cost, but not in such a way that I think can sustain the claim here that there has been a proper estimate made.

Mr. NORRIS. The rule says "an estimate by the head of a department." This very estimate has been before the Senator's committee since the 8th day of October last.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I would say to the Senator it was only sent in in compliance with a Senate resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It is no regular estimate for an appropriation; it is only in compliance with that resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that should add to its importance. It is a request made by the Senate, not a request made by the committee; but when the estimate came in it was referred to the committee. It has been before the Senator's committee since the time I have mentioned.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The law provides that—

All annual estimates for the public service shall be submitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be included in the Book of Estimates prepared under his direction.

This has never gone through that operation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the point of order is insisted upon, it must be sustained.

Mr. NORRIS. I appeal to the Senator, the chairman of the subcommittee, that he ought not to make the point of order against this amendment. It is not saving any time. I am not to blame, neither is this particular subject, but I submit that a great deal of time has been taken up by the Senate in the discussion of the District appropriation bill. If I had been instrumental in taking it up and taking it up unnecessarily, I would feel different about it from what I do.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator I should like very much to comply with his request, but there are other Senators here who had amendments that they have withdrawn. This bill has been before the Senate for nearly two weeks. If one amendment is admitted we will have to admit others.

Mr. NORRIS. Not by any means.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Whilst I would like very much to accommodate the Senator, and there may be something in it, but there are other amendments just as meritorious that have been withdrawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on page 30 of the bill, line 6, I move to strike out "$1,400" and to insert "$1,500."

This particular amendment which I have offered will be a sufficient foundation for a few remarks which I desire to make on the bill. The amendment I have offered refers to the location of a bathing beach somewhere in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be stated, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, line 6, after the word "grounds," it is proposed to strike out "$1,400" and to insert "$1,500."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the tidal basin, with which I presume every Senator is familiar, is a large pool of water, from 4 to 8 feet deep, located in Potomac Park. It contains 110 acres. It is of no particular use now, except that a few people have boats and small yachts floating upon it. It is connected with the main channel of the river by a drawbridge, where the water can be shut off and turned on and again connected with what is known as the Washington Channel. That is the part of the stream this side of the island. The connection between this channel and the tidal basin is a small opening that is but a few feet across and has a bridge spanning it. Trains, street cars, and automobiles cross it.

So we have here 110 acres of water connected with the river, with the Washington Channel. With those two exceptions it is entirely surrounded by land. It is no good to anyone, of no particular beauty to look at, because there is the river just on the other side and the Washington Channel on this side, and anyone can see it who wants to look at a bit of water.

The tidal basin has been made by the development of Potomac Park, where the mud and sand were pumped out of the river and put behind a retaining wall, and a beautiful park was made out of what before was nothing but a marsh. The Government of the United States has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in reclaiming that land. It is to-day, as everyone knows, one of the most beautiful parks anywhere around the city of Washington. I am reminded by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] that the Government and the District together made this improvement. That is true.

There is only one possible drawback to this park, and that is that the trees are all small; but it has been planted to trees, and it is only a question of time until it will be the finest beauty spot anywhere in the District of Columbia. In this park, surrounded by a wall, is this 110 acres, known as the tidal basin. I want to compare that tidal basin with the floor of the Senate Chamber and show you how it is connected. Over here to the left [indicating] is the Potomac River; where that door is [indicating] is the connection between this big basin and the Potomac River; over here at this door [indicating] is the Washington Channel. There [indicating] is the connection, smaller still, and the only connection that this tidal basin has with the outside. So it is a model location for public bathing, having no other use under the sun to which it can be put, and yet it is not used.

Over farther in this same park are some concrete basins—three of them, I think; I do not now remember their dimensions—where this same water is pumped in and let out again, and those are the bathing places in the District of Columbia. If you will go there in the summer time, you will find at 7 o'clock in the morning, when this place is first opened, a line of boys, and, on days when women are admitted, girls and grown women, ready to go into those pools, that are not much bigger than the pool of an ordinary Young Men's Christian Association building, yet almost within a stone's throw are 110 acres of as fine a body of water as there is anywhere, and nobody can use it, because no bathing houses have been built there and the beaches have not been sanded, perhaps.

It was the intention of the amendment which I offered to give to the people of Washington—to the boys, the girls, the men, and the women—a place large enough to accommodate the entire District, where in the summer time they can go bathing.

There is not another city in the United States located as is the city of Washington where this matter has been neglected as it has been here. We have gone to the expense in the last 10 or 15 years of creating this body of water, and there it stands useless; it is no good to anybody; but thousands of people who want to go in bathing in the summer time have no place to go.

The little pools we have, of which I have spoken, the concrete pools, are so crowded that it is necessary that rules and regulations be made governing their use. So you will find in the summer time at certain hours of the day boys are admitted; at certain other hours smaller children are admitted; at other hours larger children are admitted; at certain other hours women are admitted; and at cetain other hours both men and women are admitted to the pools, which are so crowded that they are practically useless. There are not one-tenth of the people who get the accommodations which they ought to have.

What I said a while ago I repeat now; there is not another city in the United States where they have any opportunity for a bathing beach, but what they have it provided for by the expenditure of public funds. Here we have the District of Columbia appropriation bill filled from beginning to end with legislation—even the very first sentence in it is legislation—and yet this amendment must go out because it is legislation. All the way through such legislation is brought in by the same committee which rejects this amendment as legislation.

I want to tell Senators of a little incident that happened here in the Senate. I knew of this document to which I have referred in the amendment, it being an estimate made by the Secretary of War, in which he approved this appropriation, and which, he says, should be made. You may search from one end to the other of this Capitol—indeed, of this entire District—and you can not find anyone opposed to it. They all say it ought to have been done years ago, but now the amendment must go out because a point of order is made against it on a bill that has more of legislation in it than it has apropriations, which legislation is in violation of this same rule that is now invoked to keep this amendment out.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator.

introduced and which was passed by the Senate. I had forgotten the number of the document, which I needed in preparing the amendment, so I called one of the little pages who sit around the Vice President's desk to me and said I did not know what the number was, but I also said to the boy, "I wish you would go up to the document room and get a document which consists of a letter from the Secretary of War in regard to a bathing beach down at the tidal basin in Potomac Park." The boy relied, "Why, I have that right here in my pocket," and he pulled the very document I was talking of out of his pocket. It was so badly worn that it was hardly legible. He had been carrying it in his pocket ever since there was such a document. How many boys in the District do you suppose have that document in their pockets now, thinking that possibly when we have a Senate that asks for the information and a Secretary of War who furnishes it and recommends it, possibly next summer or the following summer, or some time in the future, there may be some use made of these 110 acres of water down there where the boys can not now go swimming?

Why, Mr. President, if the point of order had not been made this proposed amendment would now be in the bill. I have taken up ten times as much time as it would have taken to adopt the amendment. I have not been instrumental in delaying the passage of this bill. I am not saying that the discussions that went on in reference to the prohibition question and the half-and-half principle were not proper, but they delayed the bill. The Senate itself has done that. We have now got back to the discussion of the bill, we have gotten through with those things, and now we come to something that will do some good for humanity, which would be of benefit to the rising generation, and then we are told that the rules must be rigidly enforced.

Why, Mr. President, there is not an item in this bill that ought to appeal so much as this one to anyone with a heart. There is no reason on earth of which I can conceive why anyone should object to making some use of this tidal basin, to making a bathing beach of it, especially as we have spent several hundred thousand dollars in placing it there. It has never been put to but one use, and that was for skating this winter. There might be some objection if using it in the summer time to swim in would prevent the boys skating on it in the wintertime when it was frozen over; but everybody knows that would be no objection. It will freeze over just the same if the weather gets cold enough, and people can skate on it just the same as they have done this winter if the weather should be sufficiently cold; but it goes without saying that we shall always have some warm weather, and there never will be a summer season when thousands and thousands of men, women, boys, and girls will not use this basin to the betterment of their health and the betterment of humanity.

Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment which I offered.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to offer the amendment I send to the desk, and will say that it is recommended by the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia on page 121 of their annual report. I understand the committee is not particularly opposed to the insertion of the item.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed by Mr. CLAPP to insert the following amendment:

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to institute, within three months after the passage of this act, in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem, in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, to condemn the land that may be necessary for the widening and extension of Spring Road NW., between Sixteenth Street and the westerly line of square No. 2901, according to the permanent system of highways plan for the District of Columbia; also the land that may be necessary to extend Spring Road across square No. 2901 to Ninth Street NW., and across square No. 2690, with a width of 90 feet; also to condemn the land that may be necessary to extend Perry Place from its present terminus to connect with Spring Place and widen Spring Place between Fourteenth Street and Sixteenth Street to a width of 50 feet, as shown on plan filed in the office of the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That the entire amount found due and awarded by the jury in said proceedings as damages plus the costs and expenses of the proceeding hereunder shall be assessed by the jury as benefits.

That there is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto, and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits, and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee informs me that during the pendency of the District appropriation bill, in view of the delay upon the bill, a great many Senators who had amendments they intended to offer have consented to refrain from offering them, and the chairman of the committee has been assured that they would not be offered, and he has given such assurance on the statement of a Senator who, jointly with me, had this amendment in hand that this amendment would not be offered. In view of that fact, rather than embarrass the chairman, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I think should be adopted by the Senate, to go into the bill after line 10, on page 86. The amendment reads:

Provided, That from and after the passage of this act the cost of all water mains shall be assessed upon the abutting property until such time as such mains shall yield a revenue from the sale of water of 5 per cent per annum upon the cost of the same.

The amendment provides for a change in the method of extending water mains throughout the city of Washington. At present the cost is paid from the revenues which are derived in a majority of cases from the poorer inhabitants and residents of the city who use water. It has been found to be unjust in all cities where investigation of the method has been conducted, and in most cities that method has been changed. Under the present plan, the money which is paid to the water department by the consumers who use the water for household purposes is used to extend mains throughout the city and beyond the inhabited portions of the city into vacant tracts of land which are being opened and put upon the market for speculative purposes at no cost to the "real estater" who engaged in selling town lots.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LANE. In just a moment. In other words, it adds a value of from 30 to 40 per cent to the property without any cost whatever to the speculator, and at the direct expense and cost of the consumers of water throughout the city.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, has the Senator offered the amendment?

Mr. LANE. I have.

Mr. NORRIS. Has he the consent of the Senator in charge of the bill?

Mr. LANE. I have not asked for it yet. I am assuming that I will get his consent as soon as I ask for it.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator know that it will take some time and may delay this bill, which it is so necessary to get through in the next 15 minutes?

Mr. LANE. I did not know that.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I understand that is the objection to amendments being offered—that they will cause some delay.

Mr. LANE. I suppose it will take some time to discuss it, but it is a matter of such great importance——

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. LANE. To hundreds and thousands of people in this city, that I think it should be taken up and adopted. The present method is wrong; it is unfair and unjust.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator must know that we have taken three or four days to discuss the half-and-half principle and a week to discuss prohibition, and, therefore, we ought not to take any time to act upon anything that is necessary for the good of the District unless it can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. LANE. There is a large amount of water in this amendment, so that in that respect it perhaps comes under the head of a prohibition measure.

At any rate I was going to say that the present method of taking the money derived from the collection of the water rates from the people of the city, especially from the poorer classes, who live in the crowded quarters and who in many cases I have no doubt by reason of the cost of water deny themselves the use of a bathtub—little children going without water—and using the money to exploit, to bring profit, and to add value to property held for purely speculative purposes is wrong; it is unfair; it is unjust.

I assume that the committee having this bill in charge have not yet had that condition of affairs drawn to their attention, and I feel quite sure that, being fair men and anxious to get the best possible results for the city, they will without loss of time consent to the adoption of the amendment as soon as it is explained to them. I do not see how the Senate or any other body that has legislative power could refuse, in behalf of the people, to adopt a measure which would so greatly equalize taxes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator a question for information. I will ask him if he has examined the status of the financial condition of the water department of the city; and, if so, does it pay? Have they money to their credit? If they are able to construct these mains, I inquire if they make to the city or to the Government any return on the investment?

Mr. LANE. I do not know whether the water system pays to the Government any money in return for the funds advanced by it; but I was informed by the Senator from Utah a day or two ago, who was then reading the report, that hundreds of thousands of dollars of the income received from the collection of water rates is used in the extension of mains. In the past the money collected from water rates—which, as I have said, in many cases comes out of the pockets of the poorer classes—has been spent to the extent of millions of dollars in increasing the value of lots held for speculative purposes, and from which in many instances very large profits have been derived.

There is one large tract lying in the northwestern portion of Washington which is, I presume, a mile long and perhaps half a mile wide—an enormous tract of land—through which there are streets, water mains, lamp posts, I presume electric light wires, with lines of curbing, without a house that I know of on the tract, these improvements having been placed there to enable the land to be sold as town lots for residence property, and I am informed that water mains have been extended through that property. If that has been done by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia—and whether it has been done or not, they have the authority to do it—without taxing any part of the cost on the abutting property, it is wrong. I think the better plan would be that which is provided in my amendment, which would compel the owner of the lot himself, at his own expense, to install water mains, subject to the regulations and under the supervision of the water department of this city, the city obligating itself to take them over at any time when they pay 5 per cent upon the cost. Such a plan would do no harm, and it would save the poor people of the city from advancing money for this purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. LANE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Without combating the Senator's proposition, I want to ask him if he has made inquiries concerning the large tract which he says is being opened for sale as to whether or not the parties owning it did not themselves construct the streets, lay the sidewalks, put in lamp-posts, and all that sort of thing? I do not know about the water mains; but did the Senator inquire about those things to ascertain the facts?

Mr. LANE. I am informed that they put in the streets, the curbs, and the sidewalks. I do not know whether they provided the lighting system; but I was also informed—although I do not know whether it is true or not—that the District put in mile after mile of water mains to serve this property. Without water mains the curbings, the sidewalks, and the decorated lamp-posts are not worth the ground they stand on, and the men who own the property, being far-sighted gentlemen, know that just as well as I do. I say that it is a bad system which permits the extension of water mains to property held for speculative purposes, thereby greatly enhancing its value, at the expense of the little fellow who lives in the alleys and crowded centers. It is not the proper way of doing that work.

Mr. GALLINGER. Whatever may be the fact as to that—and it is worthy of consideration—the further fact remains that there is no city on this continent and perhaps no city in the world which is supplied water as cheaply as is the city of Washington, and the "little fellow" gets the same benefit that the "big fellow" does.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], in answer to his question, that the revenues for the year ending June 30, 1914, from water used in the District of Columbia, were $828,296.69. Of that amount there was expended $794,952.16, leaving a credit to the water department of $32,497.90.

That expenditure was along these lines: Fifty-two per cent of it was used for the extension of water mains and 27 per cent of it was for the maintenance charges of the system. That has been the plan of the District from the time that they first took over the water system of the city, and all water extensions which have been made, I think I am safe in saying, have been made from the revenues of the department.

Now, one other thing. In the District the minimum water rate, allowing 7,500 gallons, is $4.50, and when the consumption reaches more than 7,500 gallons the rate is 4 cents a hundred gallons. The average of all water meters in the District of Columbia shows a charge of $5.80 a year. Water is cheaper in the District of Columbia, I think, than anywhere else in all the world.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator, Mr. President, how the amount of the original cost of construction has been paid? Has it been paid out of the general revenues, or has it been paid out of moneys collected from the sale of water?

Mr. SMOOT. Ever since the District took over the water system it has been extended by the expenditure of the receipts obtained from the use of water.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Has there been any return of any of the money that went into the plant originally?

Mr. SMOOT. The returns have been a great deal more than the amount that originally went into the plant outside of the extensions.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Have they been applied to the payment of the plant?

Mr. SMOOT. They have been applied to the payment of other expenses of the District, which, of course, would be the same thing. There is no bonded indebtedness upon the system, nor any debt whatever.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then it was paid for originally out of the general appropriations?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the same as the purchase of any other property.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Half from the revenues of the District and half from those of the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. Half from the revenues of the District and half from the revenues of the Government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have understood that there are to be some extensions of the water mains, which will cost a great deal of money. If that is going to be the case, it seems to me these moneys ought to be conserved, at least to some extent, for that purpose.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, allow me to say, for the information of the Senator from Colorado, that, judging from the statement made by the Senator from Utah, the District takes 52 per cent of its revenues derived from water rates to be used for the extension of mains.

Mr. SMOOT. They expended that percentage for the year 1914, and I think perhaps that is a fair average.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, has the Senator sent up his amendment?

Mr. LANE. I have the amendment here.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Has the Senator sent it to the desk?

Mr. LANE. No; I have not sent it to the desk so far. I want to prepare it very carefully.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator offering the amendment that there are two sides to the question as to whether this would be a benefit to the poor people of the District. In my opinion, if this proposed plan were adopted it would stop the opening of many new residence districts outside of the city proper. It would stop the erection of cheaper buildings that the poor people could occupy for less rent. There is that question, which ought to be taken into consideration.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator evidently is very familiar with the affairs of the water department. I should like to ask him whether it is contemplated that there shall be constructed a new source of water supply or water plant. As the Senator knows, we begin the supply of water at Great Falls, and conduct it down to the city. I have been told by persons that I do not know have the correct information that the construction of a new plant is contemplated, a new source of water supply from the Potomac River. If that is the case, I think this money ought to be conserved in the Treasury instead of being used in building mains. In fact, I am somewhat in sympathy with the statement of the Senator from Oregon, because I can not believe it is to the interest of the Government that we should construct mains until they are needed, and until they bring in some revenue upon the amount of money that is invested in building them.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that since the establishment of meters in the District, in 1905, the per capita use of water in the District has greatly decreased. I understand that beginning with that year up to the present time there has been a decrease of 33⅓ per cent. In other words, at that time the consumption per capita in the District of Columbia was 227 gallons per day. Now, as I stated, it is about 33 per cent less than that amount.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that at that time there was more or less agitation, or at least suggestions made, to the effect that we would require another supply.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. To obviate that some of us interested ourselves in having the houses metered. The waste of water in Washington was enormous. Everybody saw it and knew it, and yet it was not remedied. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I feel sure that since the system of metering houses and public buildings has been adopted there is no suggestion of the need of another water supply, certainly not in the near future, and perhaps not in the remote future.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am thoroughly in accord with the metering of private houses in the District of Columbia as well as public buildings, because I know that it conduces to saving, and necessarily in the end will produce an effect that will make a plant last 40 years longer than it would last under the wasteful system we have had.

Mr. SMOOT. By means of the pitometer service for the prevention of water waste through underground flow there has been saved annually over two million and a half gallons of water in the District that formerly was wasted; and I have not heard any suggestions of late that it will be necessary to expend a large amount of money to increase the water supply in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, that is not the question. The question of metering the water supply piped to a house is a simple proposition, as I suppose anyone that has had any experience with it knows. If it is not metered and measured, the tenant of the house will waste it, or he may do so, either through leaky pipes, poor plumbing, or just ordinary sheer carelessness and shiftless disposition, or to prevent it from freezing in the wintertime, or in the summer through opening all the faucets in order to get a cool drink of water. Every city has discovered that meters pay. Every house should be metered and every supply pipe entering a factory should be metered, and the rate should be equitable.

Everybody wants the people of Washington to have plenty of water, and at as low a rate as possible; but if, from the water rates derived from the city, we are to continue to expend 52 per cent for the extension of mains, without any cost to the property owner, or without any assurance that it will pay the city a return in meter rates, we are making a mistake. We are merely visiting the cost upon the poorer and more thickly settled and older portions of the community for the benefit, in many cases, of speculators—men who buy property for the sole purpose of speculating in it, and are dependent upon this advance made by their poorer fellow citizens in the city to reap their profit.

Why, it is utterly wrong. It is inexcusable. It should not be allowed. Merely calling attention to the fact that the condition exists ought to be, it seems to me, enough to convince anyone.

Mr. President, I submit my amendment, which I ask to have read, and I hope the committee will accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 86, after line 10, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That from and after the passage of this act the cost of all water mains shall be assessed upon the abutting property upon such time as such mains shall yield a revenue from the sale of water of 5 per cent per annum upon the cost of the same.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, this, as I understand, would almost entirely revolutionize the present water system. It is new legislation, and there is no estimate made for it; therefore I make the point of order against it.

Mr. LANE. I will say that it does not cost a cent. It will reduce expenditures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KERN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 81, at the end of line 22, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following words:

Provided, That no brick or other building material that may be produced at said workhouse or reformatory shall be sold or offered for sale in competition with the products of free labor, or otherwise to any department or institution of the government of the District of Columbia or of the United States, or to any public or private corporation, partnership, person, or persons.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, this amendment is offered as an addition to the clause on page 81, which provides as follows:

The commissioners are authorized, under such regulations as they may prescribe, to sell to the various departments and institutions of the government of the District of Columbia and of the United States the products of said workhouse and said reformatory, and all moneys derived from such sales shall be paid into the Treasury—one-half to the credit of the United States and one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia.

I wish to add this proviso so that convict labor which engages in making bricks or other building material shall not come in competition with the free labor engaged in the same business in this District.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Indiana what disposition could be made of the brick that is manufactured at the workhouse if his amendment should prevail.

Mr. KERN. I do not know that there is any compulsory law or rule by which they are compelled to make bricks. They could be used on the ground. They could be used for a new building, perhaps, that was being built by the commissioners themselves. I do not know. It is the same question that comes up all the time in regard to convict labor and free labor. The brickmakers, the men who have invested their money in the city of Washington in the manufacture of brick and in dealing in stone and other building materials, and the men who work for them, are, of course, subject to competition with the convict labor at the workhouse and the reformatory. It is the same old question we have had over and over again.

Mr. GALLINGER. At the National School for Boys they are raising flowers. They sell, I think, a couple of thousand dollars' worth, perhaps, in a year. If the florists of Washington should ask that an amendment be put in this bill denying that institution the right to sell those flowers, would the Senator think it was desirable?

Mr. KERN. I suppose that would be a rather small matter compared with this.

Mr. GALLINGER. The principle is the same.

Mr. KERN. I will meet that question when I come to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply want to observe that at a large expense the government of the District of Columbia has purchased nearly 2,000 acres of land, as I remember, in the State of Virginia, for the establishment of a workhouse, and is about to establish a reformatory there. Those people are better off, happier, and more contented if they have some work to do. In the economy of things the commissioners have found that there is clay there and facilities for making brick. I do not know to what extent they have interfered with other manufacturers of brick; I should think perhaps not to any extent at all up to the present time. I can not for the life of me understand, however, why the brick made there should not be used for the construction of buildings in the District of Columbia, which is denied by this amendment, and why those people, most of them committed for minor offenses, some of them for more serious offenses, should not be allowed the privilege of performing some work and being of some use to the community.

I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, a point of order can not be made against this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the ground of his point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I make it on the ground that it is general legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. SWANSON. This is an amendment that was put on in the House. Let the whole amendment go out, and we are satisfied.

Mr. GALLINGER. We are not dealing with the House amendment at all.

Mr. SWANSON. It is an amendment that was put on in the House, and has come to the Senate, and this is an amendment to the House amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. But it is not an amendment when it comes here from the House. It is a part of the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. No; it is not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SWANSON. I can not see why the Government should prohibit the sale of convict-made goods and then create here in Virginia a convict camp to interfere with the legitimate enterprises of the people there. There is no limit to which this can go, except the number of convicts; and I can not see why it should be permitted if the Government believes in that policy, which has passed the Senate repeatedly and is a law on the statute books now, but which this provision proposes to repeal. It proposes to repeal a general statute of the United States. We want to exclude these products from the District of Columbia as a matter of justice to some enterprises that would be ruined if this were continued.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is there not a mistake in the amendment, where it says that it shall be inserted on line 22, page 81? Is it not after line 14, after the amendment of the committee?

Mr. KERN. We may not have the same print. It follows the conclusion of the provision on that subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have the bill reported by the committee to the Senate, with amendments.

Mr. SWANSON. It is at the end of that paragraph.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well. I was misled in regard to that. It is an amendment to the committee amendment, as I understand the matter.

Mr. SWANSON. To the House amendment, that the committee reported; that is right.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; but it is not a House amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. It is the House language.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is under the head of "Reformatory." Is that right?

Mr. SWANSON. It is under the House language, on page 81. That is the House language.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the House language; yes.

Mr. SWANSON. We insist, Mr. President, that this general law ought not to be repealed by this language so as to injure brick manufacturers, labor, and other enterprises of that character that are covered by this amendment. If the Government is going to have a general policy in connection with convicts, then there is no reason why an exception should be made in this case. Those people can very easily work on Government roads. The convicts in Virginia work on State roads. The Government has sufficient roads to build on its property around here, and I think it would be well to let these convicts be engaged in that business.

Mr. GALLINGER. If they work on roads, do they not work in competition with free labor?

Mr. SWANSON. But nobody objects to that. Nearly all the States have adopted that as a way to let the convicts work. The Government has land over in Alexandria County. There is a necessity of having goods roads over it. The Government owns about one-third or nearly one-third of all the real estate in Alexandria County, and it certainly ought to have good roads through its land. We people in Virginia build good roads up to the Government land, and we are very anxious that it shall continue the roads through its land. The convicts could work on good roads around Washington and the District of Columbia. What we ask is that this general policy, which prevents convict labor from interfering with outside enterprises, shall be continued here, and not have this exception made.

Mr. GALLINGER. While I am as clear in my mind as I ever was about any proposition that this is not general legislation on an appropriation bill, the Chair has ruled that the point of order is not well taken, and I have nothing further to say about it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to say that in Colorado we have solved this problem as between labor and the manufacturer of goods, and it has been done by the passage of laws that require the convicts to work upon the public roads or to work upon the farms. The competition as against privately owned farms is so slight, because nearly all of the products of the farms go to the world's markets, that it is not objected to at all by the farmers. Consequently we have State farms, and we have gangs of convicts sent out on the public roads.

I want to say, furthermore, that by reason of giving to the convict a commutation of 10 days for every 30 days of service we have produced a revolution in the way of reform in the treatment of prisoners. We do not have any armed guards to conduct the penitentiary convicts in their work—simply two unarmed superintendents to a gang of 50 men—and we have had less escapes than we had under the old system of confining the prisoners.

Everybody recognizes that the convict should be given an opportunity to work and develop his mind and also his body. From a sanitary standpoint, from a health-giving standpoint, this new plan has been found to be most excellent. These men are taken out on the roads, sometimes as far as 200 miles from the penitentiary, and they are put into a camp there, with no wire fences around it and nothing at all to keep them in. The result has been that we have had fewer escapes than under the old plan. The convicts swear before they go out that they will not attempt to escape nor permit any other man to escape. There was an instance where a convict sneaked away, and another convict saw him, and he went to the camp and got a rifle and followed him 8 miles and brought him back and surrendered him to the authorities. Another convict, just before I left Colorado two years ago, came to the office of the pardoning board and said: "I am here to present my own case." He was asked what he was convicted of, and he said "murder." He was serving a life sentence. "How did you get here?" "Why," he said, "I was working 60 miles from here, and they told me I could come down and present my case." He came down and presented his case, and after being heard he went back and continued his work.

If this system produces a reform of that kind, it is not only good, but it is putting the work in the right direction. The labor organizations do not object to it, the farmers do not object to their working on the farms, and it seems to me we ought to confine their labors to those two branches.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I merely wish to add to what my colleague has said the fact that organized labor not only acquiesces in but actively approves this method of solving the question of convict labor. It improves the standard of the convict; it keeps him in a healthy atmosphere; it appeals to his spirit of honor and fair dealing; it awakens all the manhood that is latent in his breast; and it is in every respect one of the most desirable and, up to date, one of the most successful and practical experiments in handling the difficult question of convict labor that has been made anywhere.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, this bill provides for the construction of enough roads to keep all of these convicts occupied and busy. When I was governor of Virginia we inaugurated in the State the system of working convicts on roads, the State controlling the camps, feeding them, clothing them, guarding them when necessary, and so on. That has been followed in different States. Every State that has tried it has made a marked success of working convicts on the roads. What we protest against is that, instead of doing that, this bill appropriates thousands and thousands of dollars for road work to be paid out of the District funds. Instead of working these convicts on the roads, improving the streets, and doing that kind of work, they desire by this amendment, nullifying the general statute against convict labor, to let them go in competition here with people engaged in the brick, stone, and other businesses. We ask to have their products excluded.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was unable to hear the Senator's amendment. I presume it is an amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NORRIS. Does it provide that the convicts shall be used in working on the roads?

Mr. SWANSON. It does not. That would be general legislation. They have come in here with a provision changing the general statute in connection with convict labor.

Mr. NORRIS. What does it provide for, briefly? What is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. That brick and other building material produced by convicts shall not be sold in competition with the same kind of material made by free labor.

Mr. NORRIS. Are they making brick and other building material there now?

Mr. SWANSON. They are going to make brick, and nobody knows what else. They are making some brick now, I think.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have appropriated money, and we have a plant at Occoquan, for the manufacture of brick.

Mr. NORRIS. What would be the objection to letting them make brick, but not dispose of the brick?

Mr. SWANSON. That is all our amendment does. They can make all they please.

Mr. NORRIS. That would be perfectly consistent with our action in some other respects. We spent four or five hundred thousand dollars in fixing up the tidal basin down here, and now we refuse to let anybody use it. On the same theory we ought to make brick for 10 or 12 years and just pile it up and not use it. That would be doing the same thing.

I do not believe you will spend as much money in making brick as you have spent in fixing up the tidal basin unless you should run for 15 or 20 years. We have a good precedent right ahead of us for doing so.

I am in sympathy with the Senator's amendment. I do not believe convict-made materials of this kind ought to come in competition with similar products of free labor.

Mr. SWANSON. As I stated, this does not prevent them from making brick down there. It simply prohibits them from making brick with convict labor in competition with free labor, which is prohibited now by a general statute. We do not think that that statute ought to be repealed and this made a special case for the benefit of the United States Government or anyone else.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I suggested a moment ago, the Chair having intimated how he would rule, I have no disposition to discuss this matter. I will content myself by suggesting to the Senator from Virginia that if the plan they have in Virginia, which he says has been very successful, of having convicts work on the roads, is not any more successful than it has been in Virginia in making good roads, it must be a failure.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the only roads in Virginia that the Senator complains of are in their present condition because Congress is so penurious that in Alexandria County, and where it has property around Washington, it will not appropriate any money to build roads through its own property in spite of the most earnest efforts. The Government does not pay any taxes in Alexandria County. It owns nearly one-third of the land there, but pays no taxes to build roads over its property, which is all we have asked. When we have improved roads up to the Government property, all we have ever asked the Government to do is to connect the roads we have built through its own property upon which it pays no taxes. The roads the Senator complains of are usually roads through Government property that the Government refuses to improve. I should be glad to have these convicts improve them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is that true of the road between here and Mount Vernon?

Mr. SWANSON. There is very little travel to Mount Vernon except by patriotic travelers. There is no commercial travel in that direction, and yet they expect the people that live along the line of the road from Washington to Mount Vernon to build a road for the use of the 50,000 people that come to Washington each year and go to Mount Vernon. There is not a city in the United States that has a magnificent monument of patriotism and glory like Mount Vernon, there is not a Government in the world that would not be generous enough to build a road to it. To tax the few farms and other lands and small pieces of taxable property from Washington to Mount Vernon to furnish good roads for people all over the United States to get to Mount Vernon is not just and right.

Mr. GALLINGER. We might say that about any of the suburbs of Washington.

Mr. SWANSON. We would like to have these convicts build that road. It ought to be a national road. To ask the small number of people that pay the taxes in that county to furnish a road that is broad enough and monumental enough and to keep it up for the 50,000 to 100,000 people that go there each year, when they are not hauling their own traffic, their own business, or attending to their own enterprises, is absolutely unreasonable. You can never expect the people there to be taxed to furnish transportation over a good road for 100,000 people each year in the United States and keep it in repair. It is a disgrace that Congress has not built a monumental road to Mount Vernon, which ought to be the Mecca of patriotism of every American citizen.

Mr. GALLINGER. The patriotism applies to Virginia as well as to Congress.

Mr. SWANSON. Virginia will pay her part of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. She has not done it.

Mr. SWANSON. She is willing to do it when a part of it comes out of the National Treasury. Does the Senator think that about 50 per cent who live on the road from Washington to Mount Vernon ought to be taxed to pay enough money to keep a monumental road in order for the 100,000 people who travel on this road from all parts of the United States? It would confiscate the farms there.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the State of Virginia ought to do it.

Mr. SWANSON. Washington is a national character, and when Virginia insists on him as being a Virginian you claim he is a national character. Yet when it comes to paying tribute you say he is a Virginian. When it comes to building monuments and things of that kind, what interest has Virginia in it outside of the interest of the rest of the United States? Every Virginian has been to Mount Vernon. It is a national movement; there is a national desire to go there. The travel is national, the monument is national, the home is held by ladies of every State in the Union. If there is one thing that ought to be national, it is the desire to honor Washington and Mount Vernon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suppose if we buy Monticello the Government will have to build a road to Monticello, because that is a monument that is national in its character.

Mr. SWANSON. It ought to do it if it is its own property.

Mr. GALLINGER. From Washington?

Mr. SWANSON. Does the Senator think the State ought to be taxed to build monuments and roads through Government property? Is the United States Government so parsimonious and so bankrupt that it can not build roads and take care of its own property and its own monuments?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not going to argue that with the Senator. His patriotism surpasses mine to such a great extent that it is not necessary.

Mr. SWANSON. I will say to the Senator that the county of Fairfax, one county in the State, has bonded itself nearly $100,000 to construct that road. It has been waiting and waiting for the Government of the United States to cooperate with it so as to have a road that will be an honor to Washington and to Mount Vernon. They have waited for Congress to make an appropriation. I have no doubt when the road is built and it is as monumental and as magnificent as it ought to be, complaint will be made that Virginia ought to build a fairer road. The county of Fairfax has bonded itself, I understand, for $100,000, and I have been trying to get a part of this fund of $250,000 devoted to experimental good roads, but I have not been able to get it. Do you not think $100,000 is enough for that county to give? It ought to be supplemented by several hundred thousand dollars by Congress to have as magnificent an avenue as the world possesses to that great home and Mecca of American patriotism.

Mr. GALLINGER. If Virginia will take a lesson from Maryland in good-road building, Virginia will have an entirely different system of roads from that which she has to-day, and if Virginia will take a lesson from the New England States or from Pennsylvania or New York or New Jersey, she will have better roads than she has to-day.

Mr. SWANSON. I will say——

Mr. GALLINGER. I say with some knowledge that the roads in Virginia are an abomination and a disgrace to that great State.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator's experience with roads in Virginia is mostly as to those he finds around Washington.

Mr. GALLINGER. A short distance out.

Mr. SWANSON. The trouble around Washington is this, that you can not get the Federal Government that runs Washington to aid us in building roads. All the traffic from Virginia is not to Washington. Alexandria is a city. Baltimore trades largely with Washington, and Washington is the center of business of a great many people. There are good roads around the city of Richmond, the city of Roanoke, the city of Norfolk, and other cities which have united with the counties and made contributions to have good roads made into those cities.

The difficulty we have had in Virginia is that the Government here has been so parsimonious, so illiberal. We have a great deal of Government land south of the Potomac which pays no taxes, and you do not make any contribution to give us roads in that direction. Any city of the size of Washington would be glad to do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. When Virginia gets rid of her tollgates and does something about building better roads more than she has done, I will agree with the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. We will do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERN. I offer the following amendment, which has heretofore been proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

For the payment of all expenses, including personal services of architects and others, and for prizes to be awarded in a competition for the best preliminary designs for a model 12-room suburban school to be hereafter erected on the site purchased north of Rhode Island Avenue for the Woodridge and Langdon neighborhood, the awards to be made by a committee consisting of the superintendent of schools, the president of the board of education, the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and the municipal architect, $5,000.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I desire to say in support of the amendment that in the last Congress an appropriation of $12,000 was made for the purchase of land in the neighborhood described for school purposes. The land has been purchased. It is situated in a growing part of the city. The school facilities there are entirely inadequate. I regret that I have misplaced the paper signed by people living in that part of the city setting forth the exact facts. I had them here on Saturday.

The situation is such in the existing school, the facilities are so inadequate, that the children are unable to attend during the full day; that is to say, they have an afternoon school. It is very necessary that a new schoolhouse be built as soon as possible. The ground has been bought, and the only appropriation asked now is that the preliminary arrangements may be made for the building of a schoolhouse. That is the purpose of this appropriation of $5,000. It has been estimated for, I will say, by the school board.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I am entirely in accord with the Senator from Indiana in seeking much needed school improvement. That is the case in many parts of the city, and there were many propositions presented to our committee to improve these schools. We wanted to improve them, but it seems that there having been no estimate for them we had to turn down quite a number of them. I will ask if there is any estimate for this.

Mr. KERN. I pointed it out to the Senator the other day. It is the estimate made by the school board.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The Senator from Indiana is right in saying that the school board took it up and gave the amount that would be requisite, but it is not estimated for by the proper authorities—the commissioners—and that is where the estimate has to come from. I would have no objection to this amendment and would be glad, so far as I am concerned, to allow the appropriation to be made, but we have had many requests of this kind, and where there has been no estimate made it would be out of order to introduce it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland make that point of order?

Mr. KERN. I did not understand what the Senator from Maryland said.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I say that there has been no estimate for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland make a point of order?

Mr. KERN. Suppose a little later it should be found that there is an estimate? I am very sure that it was estimated for.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator if there is an estimate for this by the commissioners, it will give me pleasure to try to get it in in conference, and I will agree to let it go in. I do not hesitate to say that, so far as I am concerned, if it was estimated for, I would agree to it, but there has been no estimate. We put in all they estimated for, and would like to have done more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland make the point of order?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With regard to the last observation made by the Senator from Maryland, he could not put it in in conference, because it would not be a subject of difference between the two Houses.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. That I recognize.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Therefore if anything is to be done it must be done now; it can not be done in conference. It seems to me this ought to be one place on the earth where nobody could reasonably contend that there were not sufficient school facilities. The people of the United States pay one-half of all the expenditures here.

In connection with this particular matter, there ought to be this school there, and it strikes me that with the great District of Columbia, wealthy as it is, paying 50 per cent and the United States themselves, wealthy as they are, paying the other 50 per cent, to have any dispute at all about $5,000 being expended for a school where it is admitted that a school ought to be, where it is admitted by everybody that the educational facilities are not sufficient without it, is sticking in the bark. I hope the Senator from Maryland will let us just vote it through and be done with it.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I entirely agree with the Senator from Mississippi that the school facilities of the District are not what they should be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And they ought to be perfect.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. They ought to be perfect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They should be as near perfect as you can get them.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. This was presented by the school board. There are schools here where they probably have to give only half days to the scholars.

Mr. KERN. That is what they are doing now.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. We wanted to make this appropriation, but there has been no estimate made for it, and we could not make it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Whose duty was it to make those estimates?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The commissioners.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The commissioners themselves have neglected their duty by not doing what the school board asked to have done. I know the school board pretty well, and they are not going to ask for things they ought not to have. Very frequently they do not ask for all they need.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. As I stated on the floor of the Senate, we had propositions made by the president of the board, Mr. Blair, in whom I have the utmost confidence, a man that I do not think would ask for anything wrong.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. But we have not been able to allow them. Of course the committee had to follow the estimates and could do nothing more.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If there is a place on earth where there ought to be a university, a college, a high school, and primary schools going from the kindergarten up, and where there is no excuse under the sun for not doing it, it is right here. This place, of all places on the surface of the earth, ought to be a model for the education of the citizen for two reasons; first, because there is the financial power to have it; and secondly, because it is the Capital of the country. Our institutions rest upon intelligence, and intelligence ought not to be absent anywhere in this District at any rate.

I hope the chairman of the subcommittee will find it possible to accept the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I have not the slightest objection to its going in.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I must say that I feel in sympathy with the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator in charge of this bill. He has raised the point of order upon other meritorious matters. The matter which the Senator from Nebraska presents is, it seems to me, very meritorious, but if the Senator from Maryland withdraws the point of order which he makes there is no telling when either this bill will be finished or how much the appropriations will amount to.

It is true that perhaps there is a requirement of some kind with relation to this particular section of the city, and yet we have not anything definite in regard to it. If you take the views of one Senator who happens to know of a certain locality, he will insist upon it. It is wise that these things should be controlled to a very large extent by estimates and by a demand upon the part of the commissioners, and then, when your schools are established, they will be established in the right way.

Mr. KERN. If the Senator will allow me, the last Congress purchased the land, and there is no trouble about the location. The school is overcrowded. They are not asking for an appropriation for a building. The appropriation of $5,000 is that the architects may prepare the plans.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I believe that these matters should be presented to the committee and let them at least see all sides, and investigate any objection that may be made to it. Legislating on the floor of the Senate is not a good way to legislate, and inasmuch as the chairman of the subcommittee has made the point of order and a good many other amendments have been presented, it seems to me that it should be insisted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland insist upon his point of order?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I make the point of order against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the Senator from Maryland. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has submitted a proposed amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I have an amendment that I want to offer.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the time that has been consumed on the other side, and also to the fact that when we had a very important amendment here a while ago, in which I was very much interested and upon which I had gathered quite a number of facts and some very interesting observations, I refrained from delivering them to the Senate and refrained from insisting upon having the amendment considered by the Senate. I merely wanted to show the Senator that I am not in the category mentioned.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 49, after line 2, insert:

Hereafter any balance remaining after the purchase of the site for the Eastern High School may be applied for the purpose of putting said site in a condition suitable for the uses for which it was purchased.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I shall have to raise the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire what rule the Senator is seeking to invoke now in this respect. I do not believe the amendment is subject to a point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It is not estimated for. There is no law giving them the right to use the money for this purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. This is in the nature of a limitation on an appropriation already made. The Eastern High School site has been appropriated for, but the site is not yet purchased. The Senator can not tell us now how much money is going to be left. There may be none. If there is none, this particular limitation would have no effect; but as near as we can estimate there will be something left if the site is purchased that has been discussed here, and I believe some proceedings have been commenced to condemn it.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I am not able to state from my own personal knowledge, but the information we have is that the amount will approximate about $40,000, and the purpose is to use that money for a purpose the present law does not justify.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment does not increase the appropriation. It seems merely to qualify the amendment. So the point of order is overruled.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska to change the amendment so as to read "hereafter any balance or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think that is an improvement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as modified in that way. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I offer the following amendment. I should like to call the attention of my colleague [Mr. SMITH] to certain bearings of it after it has been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 41, at the end of line 11, at the end of the items for the McKinley Manual Training School, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That in the expenditure of these appropriations for manual-training high schools there shall be no discriminating charge made against pupils from any State or Territory of the United States, who shall be admitted and taught on the same basis as pupils residing, or whose parents reside, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the bill to this amendment. It adds no additional expense and is not an appropriation that has not been estimated for. It merely provides how that which is already appropriated shall be expended. It is not general legislation, because it applies to the expending on an appropriation. Under these circumstances I trust the amendment will be acceptable to him and to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President, does not the amendment contemplate that pupils from all over the country can come here and be taught free of charge in these schools? That seems to be pretty general legislation.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. It is no more general than the appropriations made in this bill are general. Here is an appropriation for a purpose, and the amendment provides that the appropriation shall be spent in such and such a manner. It is absolutely germane with the spending of the money and is absolutely free from any objection under the rule.

Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the subject of this amendment, and I believe it will commend itself to their kindly sympathy.

The State of Maryland has gone to great expense in creating a school of technology in Baltimore under the Johns Hopkins University. The initial expenditure that the State made for that school of technology was $600,000. That school is open for general education along these absolutely important lines, especially important to the people of that section of the United States. It is the preparation for these schools of technology that the Manual Training High School provides. Any ambitious boy who wants to pay the railroad fare—and, of course, the number would be strictly limited, because it is a special business—any poor boy who is willing to make that effort certainly ought to get that much encouragement from the expenditures in the National Capital. I am simply asking that that may be done. Particularly I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire, who has been talking about the roads in Virginia, that here is a case where a State has made a liberal and large expenditure for technical education and that we want the District of Columbia to reciprocate for the preliminary preparation upon this line of important schooling to the limited extent that any poor boy coming into this District and paying the transportation might be willing to take advantage of.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not going to make a point of order against this amendment. I do not know whether any other Senator will or not; but I want to say to the Senator from Maryland that while Maryland has built good roads and spent large amounts of money in building them, Maryland does not ovrlook the fact that we have to pay pretty liberally for using them. The Senator's proposition is to open our technical schools. He ought to include the Armstrong Manual Training School, which is a colored school strictly, because that has equal rights, certainly, with the other. He proposes to open those technical schools to the pupils from all over the United States to come here and be educated free of charge.

I see no reason why we should not open all our schools on the same basis, why our grammar schools and primary schools and kindergarten should not be opened if technical knowledge is to be opened. I do not think it is good legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the Senator from New Hampshire think, the fact being considered that parents of children outside of the District of Columbia pay 50 per cent of the cost of carrying on these schools, their children ought to be entitled just as much to attend them as the children of parents who live in the District of Columbia, who pay only the other 50 per cent? I agree with the Senator that it ought to apply to all the schools here. Every school in Washington, from the primary up, ought to be as free to the children of the parents who do not live in the District of Columbia, who pay one-half, as to the children of parents who do live in the District of Columbia, that pay the other half.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course that is broadening the proposition, as I suggested, and if that is to be the policy I think it would be very much better policy than to simply apply it to one class of our schools.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, it seems to me this ought to apply to all schools in Washington, as suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire. Of course the States that would be benefited most by it would be the States of Maryland and Virginia. A great many people bring their children here from other States. Many people who are officeholders and live in Virginia are permitted to send their children here. They pay very little taxes in Virginia, and that makes it more or less difficult to have as good high schools and as good a grade of schools around Washington as otherwise we would have. That condition has to some extent hurt Virginia and Maryland.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly the Senator has not looked at the amendment that the committee reported and which has been agreed to at the bottom of page 46. The committee has met with the proposition, on the one hand, that the school should be open free of charge to everybody. On the other hand, it was claimed that they ought to be open to the States contiguous to the District of Columbia. The present law allows people performing official duties here to have their children educated in the District of Columbia. The committee has enlarged that so as to provide that—

Hereafter all pupils whose parents are employed officially or otherwise in the District of Columbia shall be admitted and taught free of charge in the schools of said District.

So that any man from Maryland or Virginia or anywhere else who is doing business in the District will have free entrée to the schools of the District. I think we have liberalized it to a very large extent.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; but we ought to go further, I think, than we have gone. The people of the United States pay one-half the expense of supporting schools in Washington, which I favor and have always voted for, because I feel that it is just and proper and right. When the people of the United States pay one half for supporting the schools of Washington it seems to me but just that the children of the other half should have the privilege of the schools. That is all we have ever asked. It is that we should have a half partnership in the benefits of Washington as we have a half partnership in its burdens.

I do not see why the United States Government, that favors education for the benefit of all its citizens to raise them to a higher grade of citizenship, should object to any citizen of the United States being permitted to come to Washington and get an education. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The geographical problem will keep them from getting here.

Mr. SWANSON. The very geographical problem suggested by the Senator from Mississippi will keep it from being abused. You must remember in Maryland and Virginia there live a great many officeholders in Washington who simply have homes and board in Virginia and their children go to our schools. We get little taxes from them. They have the privileges of schools in Maryland and Virginia, and the principle of reciprocity ought to extend to the people of these two States the privileges of the schools of Washington, because a proportionately large part of the officials in Washington have the privileges of the schools of Virginia and pay practically no taxes to support them.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not hear the reading of the amendment. I ask the Senator from Virginia if this amendment has particular application to Maryland and Virginia?

Mr. SWANSON. Not at all; it applies to any citizen of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. In its practical application will not the result be that the benefits will be derived by the citizens of Maryland and Virginia?

Mr. SWANSON. Very largely that is true; but the Senator must remember that Maryland and Virginia very largely educate free of cost a large part of the children of the officials in Washington who have suburban homes in Maryland and Virginia.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I presume that is true. I have not said anything against the amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. We thought it but right that there should be reciprocity; and we thought it was not proper to limit its scope to Maryland, which would be a discrimination; but the geographical situation of other States will make it an impossibility for the privilege to be abused in the way of overcrowding the schools of Washington.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course it ought to be general in its terms.

Mr. SWANSON. It ought to be.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but, as a matter of practical application, the benefits will be derived by the people of Virginia and of Maryland.

Mr. SWANSON. That is largely true.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator understands, does he not, that this amendment is subject to a point of order? The chairman of the committee, coming from Maryland, would, of course, make the point of order on something which affects Maryland, as he has made it on other similar amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that the Senator from Maryland will look after it in the proper way when the time comes. I take it for granted, however, that the Senator's idea is, it being a Maryland matter, that I would not make the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. I have suggested that of course I knew the Senator would do so.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I understand what the Senator has suggested, but we can sometimes draw our own conclusions.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and I am going to draw mine, Mr. President. The debate had gone on here so long and no point of order had been made that I had already commenced to draw it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am on the committee with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], and I feel that a point of order ought to be made against the amendment. I therefore make the point of order.

I want to say, with relation to the matter, that the half-and-half principle as applied between the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia has nothing to do, as it seems to me, with an amendment of this kind, because the United States Government, as a government and the holder of property in the District, is supposed to get its compensation in the way of protection from the District. Therefore it is not fair to say that everybody in the entire United States shall have privileges of this kind in addition to the Government having such privileges. For that reason I do not believe that the half-and-half principle applies or should apply to a matter of this character.

Mr. President, it seems to me that as every school district in the United States provides whenever a child comes into that district it shall pay tuition of some kind, it is nothing but fair to the people of the District whenever a child comes into their schools from any State, they giving to the Government, by reason of the Government paying one-half of the expense, this protection in all directions in government, the same rule ought to prevail. The price of the tuition is not high; it is not regarded as a very great burden; and it seems to me that, in order to protect the people of the District of Columbia with respect to this matter, the point of order ought to be made. I therefore contend, Mr. President, that the point of order that this amendment is general legislation should prevail.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I offered this amendment, and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] probably did not listen to my preliminary explanation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. Is the point of order debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not.

Mr. THOMAS. I make the point of order that the point of order is not debatable.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I ask the Senator to withhold his point of order for a moment.

Mr. THOMAS. I am quite anxious to see a final vote upon this bill this week, and the prospect is not now very promising.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair believes the amendment to be general legislation and sustains the point of order.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Is an appeal from the decision of the Chair debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I am glad to lay before the Senate the fact that this amendment is drawn with the intent of not being open to a point of order. The amendment provides that in the expenditure of the appropriations made by this bill they shall be expended so and so. You, Mr. President, were out of the Chamber when I explained the amendment. I doubt very much, if you had not been by absence cut off in listening to the statement of the amendment, that you would have decided as you have decided. In fact, I doubt very much, Mr. President, if you ever read the amendment before you decided the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not believe that the Chair is called upon to sit here and have statements of that kind made from the floor of the Senate, which impugn the honor, honesty, and integrity of the Chair.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I certainly want to disclaim any reflection upon the honor or the honesty of the Chair. I am perfectly willing to have the Chair say whether he had ever read the amendment before.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did read the amendment and is now rereading it.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I am glad that the President is rereading the amendment.

Mr. President, the question whether the expenditure of a sum of money can be regulated by the Senate without having a point of order made against that regulation is the question now before the Senate. There is not a single dollar added to this appropriation by that amendment, not a single cent of burden is thrown upon any taxpaying contributor, but the amendment provides that the money shall be spent so and so. If that is not within the discretion and power of the Senate in passing an appropriation bill, the power of the Senate over appropriation bills has practically gone. Any Member of the Senate can rise and make a point of order under this ruling and take out of the hands of the Senate the power to say how money appropriated shall be expended.

I wish the Senate could decide this for themselves, and I regret that you, Mr. President, have brought in the issue of your own dignity as the presiding officer in the discussion of this minor matter. I disclaim any reflection upon you, and I ask the same consideration from the Chair.

Mr. President, I will ask to have the amendment read.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator from Maryland some questions in regard to the amendment. The amendment is, on page 41, at the end of line 11, to insert:

Provided, That in the expenditure of these appropriations for manual-training high schools there shall be no discriminating charge made against pupils from any State or Territory of the United States, who shall be admitted and taught on the same basis as pupils residing, or whose parents reside, in the District of Columbia.

What I wanted to ask the Senator was, if it were not true that there is now on the statute books a law that does make such a discrimination?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. There is general legislation to that effect; but this particular appropriation by this amendment, properly and consistently with the rules of the Senate, is proposed to be taken from under that general legislation by reason of a special provision with reference to this particular appropriation.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator contend, because of the language immediately preceding or following this in the bill, that it would modify the intent really of this provision? I have not considered it in connection with the other language of the bill.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I maintain that the Senate in making an appropriation can apply that appropriation in a way that might not be consistent with general legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but outside of this bill, in a general law, as I understand, there are provisions made by which there is a discrimination against people coming into the schools of the District from outside of the District. Is not that true?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I so understand.

Mr. NORRIS. They have to pay tuition, and I do not know but that there are some other regulations with which they have to comply. The effect of this amendment would be to repeal that law, would it not?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. To the extent of the expenditure of this appropriation. That is just what I have said to the Senator very distinctly.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the admission just made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] that this amendment would have the effect of repealing or modifying the existing statute proves clearly that it is general legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I ask to have the amendment stated before the vote is taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment on which the opinion of the Chair is challenged as to whether or not it is general legislation.

The SECRETARY. On page 41, in the item relative to the McKinley Manual Training School, at the end of line 11, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That in the expenditure of these appropriations for manual training high schools there shall be no discriminating charge made against pupils from any State or Territory of the United States, who shall be admitted and taught on the same basis as pupils residing, or whose parents reside, in the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who is absent. If I were privileged to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], but I am informed that, if he were present, he would vote with me on this question. I therefore feel at liberty to vote, and do vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but I am informed by his colleague that, if he were present, he would vote "yea" upon this question. I feel, therefore, at liberty to vote the same way. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] is necessarily absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. STONE (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. STONE. Then I will have to withdraw my vote, as I have a general pair with that Senator.

The result was announced—yeas 60, nays 1, as follows:

YEAS—60.

So the Senate sustained the ruling of the Chair.

The bill was reported as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 6856.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia, to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and for that reason withhold my vote. If I were privileged to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I inquire if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with that Senator, and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. O'GORMAN'S name was called). I again announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], on account of illness in his family, and I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. As he is not here, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when Mr. VARDAMAN'S name was called). In reference to the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], I am requested to announce for this vote and the last that he is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Not knowing how he would vote if he were present, and not having secured a transfer of my pair, I must withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 24, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia, to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, on Thursday, the 7th of January, I was addressing the Senate on this bill. It was requested that it be laid aside for the District of Columbia appropriation bill. At that time no one anticipated that so long a time would be required for the consideration of the latter measure, so I am compelled to take up my remarks after a considerable interval. The time which has elapsed and the fact that certain Senators are now here who were not here on the prior occasion will justify some small amount of repetition. I may also say that there have been developments in relation to this measure since the 7th of January which justify a further reference to the argument advanced on that occasion.

So far as I know, not a single chamber of commerce or commercial body in the United States has expressed itself in regard to the measure except in condemnation. No organization of that nature has expressed a favorable opinion of this bill. Opposition has been voiced by the Chamber of Commerce of the City of New Orleans in one of the most cogent set of resolutions yet voiced against the measure; and yet that is the city which it is maintained by the advocates of the bill is the most seriously injured by the present situation and most in need of the passage of the bill. If you await a declaration by the press of the thick-and-thin partisan type, its voice has been raised unanimously against this measure. Another development in regard to this bill has also occurred; that is the reference to the measure made by the President of the United States in his speech at Indianapolis. At some later time I may take occasion to comment upon it as well as upon the address of the Secretary of the Treasury at Chicago, but I wish to dwell today upon certain fundamental facts and principles involved in this very manifest departure from the policies adopted by the United States.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I call attention to the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Perkins	Sterling
Brandegee	Hughes	Poindexter	Stone
Bristow	James	Pomerene	Sutherland
Bryan	Johnson	Reed	Swanson
Burton	Jones	Robinson	Thompson
Chamberlain	Lane	Saulsbury	Thornton
Clark, Wyo.	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Walsh
Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Warren
Dillingham	Myers	Shively	Weeks
du Pont	Norris	Simmons	White
Fletcher	Oliver	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Gallinger	Overman	Smith, Ga.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, on January 7 I referred to a number of very important questions involved in this discussion, which I trust will be very carefully discussed.

The one which presents itself at the very outset is the general policy of Government ownership. It will be recognized that the operation of a business by the Federal Government which heretofore has been conducted by private parties is a very serious departure from established policy. Furthermore, the entering upon such a field by a country so large and so populous as the United States is clearly distinct from the same question as presented by a small country like Switzerland, for instance, or Belgium.

The second question which presents itself is whether it is desirable or feasible, in any form of enterprise, that it should in part be conducted by the Government and in part by private enterprise.

Abraham Lincoln, in an expression which has been very widely quoted, said that the country could not remain half slave and half free. It is very desirable that any policy of government shall be of uniform application throughout the country. It is equally desirable that in the conduct of any form of activity either private or public agency shall have exclusive control. The best thought of the country has favored, in municipal enterprise, exclusive control, either by the municipality or by private parties. In case both take up any form of public-service enterprise—electric lighting, gas works, water works, or whatever it may be—there is sure to be collision, duplication of plants, higher costs, and probably inefficiency.

The argument oftentimes used for a partial occupancy of the field by the public is that the municipal electric plant, or whatever it may be, will serve as a check on private exploitation, will prevent extortionate prices, and will secure improved service; but in almost every instance this has not proved to be the case. The result is that neither is sufficiently equipped to occupy the field, that neither performs a service as good as would be rendered by one plant having full responsibility for funding the service. Exactly this question arises here.

It is not contemplated that the Government shall attempt to purchase and operate ships on a scale which will supply more than a bare fraction of the transportation industry by sea. The merchant marine of the United States however decadent it may be in over-sea traffic, has been estimated to have a value of $560,000,000. This estimate, of course, is a mere approximation. This bill contemplates an expenditure of $40,000,000, or one-fourteenth of that amount. Not only reasoning on general principles, but judging by the experience of cities which have entered the field of public utilities on a small scale, we may confidently predict that ill success would result from such an attempt as this.

Then there is a third question: Is this a kind of enterprise into which the Government can profitably enter? To my mind the arguments are strongest successively on these three questions: First, against Government ownership; second, against partial Government ownership and partial private ownership; third, against this particular field of effort.

The shipping business is one which in an unusual degree is successfully conducted or unsuccessfully conducted in accordance with the skill and the experience of those engaged in it. Those who are successfully engaged in the business have made it a lifelong occupation. One gentleman who has presented here a statement of ocean traffic and his objections to this bill visited the Plate country in 1863 and has been familiar with the trade to the east coast of South America for more than 50 years. Is it probable that the members of the Cabinet or any men who have been engaged in other occupations can enter into the field of transportation and do as efficient work as these men who have given their lives to it?

Some seem to think that a few men may gather around a table, smoke cigars, discuss questions requiring expert knowledge and ability, and reach conclusions as wise as those who have given their lives to that particular business. I have met persons who thought that the great inventions were the result of some sudden inspiration; that the great discoveries in electricity came from men who, as it were, peered out into the darkness and brought in an electric light or a telephone or something of the kind. Such, however, is not the case. The great inventor, Mr. Edison, stated a few weeks ago that genius consisted of 10 per cent inspiration and 90 per cent perspiration. If the Government should organize a corporation and engage in the shipping business, there would be in the management perhaps 10 per cent of inspiration and almost surely 90 per cent of inexperience, which inevitably, in any business enterprise, results in bad management, inefficiency, and failure.

Again, in order to conduct the shipping business successfully it is necessary to create or secure the ready use of wharves and other terminal facilities. The ships which sail the ocean can not maintain a successful business without convenient and expeditious opportunities for loading and unloading. They must have, in addition to that, affiliations with shippers. They must have knowledge as to the routes of trade. They must anticipate the future and provide for future demands. They must have a knowledge of the seasonal movements of freight and must solve the intricate problem of its most efficient transportation.

Still further, in many instances the business of shipping is connected with that of the merchant. The sea captains of Maine and of the other States of New England who followed their calling with such wonderful success and made our clippers and sailing ships the marvel of ocean transportation were not merely the owners of the boats; they traded to the Indies and to China, made their purchases from merchants, brought the products of far-off Cathay and of the Orient to the United States, and sold them at a profit. While this is not true to-day in so large a degree as it was 100 or 75 or even 50 years ago, it is still a feature of the shipping business. The shipowner may have a cargo to South America, to the west coast, or to the east coast, and may engage in the venture, being assured of freight only for the outward voyage. At the other end he may discover that there is no return cargo. In view of that situation he purchases products of South America—nitrates, ores for reduction, or agricultural products.

Is the Government going to engage not merely in the shipping business, but in the mercantile business as well? Instances are sure to arise in which the purchase of a return cargo would be absolutely necessary for the successful conduct of the business; and yet I can not conceive that a corporation dominated by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce could engage in trade.

Thus we see that if this Government is about to enter upon any line of activity which heretofore has been left to private enterprise, one of the most unfavorable fields which it could enter is that of the buying and operation of ships. Indeed, I think there is much of validity to a remark which was made to me a few days ago to this effect: "If I were the worst enemy of Government ownership, there is nothing over which I should have more cause for congratulation than the entry of the Government of the United States into the ownership and operation of ships."

Mr. President, in my remarks a few days ago I omitted one very important line engaged in the traffic to the east coast of South America. That is the Lloyd Brazileiro, a Brazilian line which owns some 100 ships in all and which controls from 40 to 45 per cent of the tonnage plying to the east coast of South America. I have a statement from the manager of that line in New York, to which I shall refer later, in which he condemns this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to inquire of the Senator if all the ships owned by this line are engaged in the traffic between ports in North America and ports in South America?

Mr. BURTON. No; they are not; in fact, only a comparatively small share of them—10 or 12.

Mr. NORRIS. Where are the most of them engaged?

Mr. BURTON. The rest are engaged in local traffic along the coast of Brazil. The coastwise trade of Brazil is provided for probably as well as that of any country of an equal degree of advancement.

Mr. NORRIS. How many of these ships, if the Senator knows, are engaged in the traffic between ports in the United States and South American ports?

Mr. BURTON. I think about 12, although I do not know that I can speak with certainty.

Mr. NORRIS. Do they have a regular schedule?

Mr. BURTON. Some of them do. For instance, the Senator from Nebraska will note that, according to advertisements in the New York Herald, two ships are scheduled to sail from New York to Rio de Janeiro, one on February 10 and one on March 10. Some of the boats carry passengers.

Mr. NORRIS. How large are these boats that are engaged in the traffic between the ports of the United States and South American ports?

Mr. BURTON. Their dead-weight capacity would be, I take it, about the same as that which I gave for the general type of boats to South America—from six or seven thousand to ten or twelve thousand tons.

Mr. NORRIS. How frequent are the sailings? How often is it possible now to ship freight between, say, New York and Brazilian ports?

Mr. BURTON. That, of course, depends upon the freight that is available; certainly every month.

Mr. NORRIS. Do they carry mail?

Mr. BURTON. The passenger boats that sail on these established schedules carry mail.

Mr. NORRIS. And carry passengers?

Mr. BURTON. And passengers, as well.

Mr. NORRIS. Why is it that as a general thing—or, at least, I have heard it so stated a great many times—the passengers going from the United States to South America go first to Europe?

Mr. BURTON. There are several reasons for that. In the first place, the average trans-Atlantic passenger is accustomed to luxurious accommodations. That has its effect upon all the passenger traffic, whether it be to Europe or to any other part of the globe. It must be conceded that these boats which ply to South America of the Lloyd Brazileiro and the Lamport and Holt lines are not quite up to the standard of the boats, say, of the Cunard Line, the White Star Line, the North German Lloyd Line, or the Hamburg-American Line. If there is any one fact that is characteristic of passenger traffic out of the United States, it is the demand for the very highest grade of accommodations. I remember that not many years ago the manager of the North German Lloyd Line stated to me that the first cabins to be taken on his line were the cabins de luxe; that they were oftentimes engaged a year in advance.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it the contention of the Senator that this bill is unnecessary because there are enough ships to supply this trade?

Mr. BURTON. I endeavored to show that in my former address to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, then why the necessity of going first to Europe to get to South America?

Mr. BURTON. In the first place, they offer a higher grade of accommodations. In the next place, many passengers to South America enjoy the opportunity of a brief stay in England or somewhere else in Europe on their way. Then, again, there are close financial relations between Brazil and England and other European countries, and in the transaction of business it is often very desirable to stop in Europe on the way.

Mr. NORRIS. In going from Europe to South America the passengers do not encounter that difficulty, do they?

Mr. BURTON. What is that?

Mr. NORRIS. That the boats are not of the luxurious nature to which the Senator referred.

Mr. BURTON. The Royal Mail Line from Southampton is a line of excellent boats. I would not say that they were of so much higher grade than those from New York to South America, but, nevertheless, they are better boats. They are faster and more up to date.

Mr. NORRIS. There certainly must be something of that kind. The persons who go that way because they want better accommodations must be able to get better accommodations from Europe to South America than they can get from the United States to South America.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, it is a better class of boats. That opens up a very, very wide field that I had not intended to dwell upon at this time; but I will say briefly that conditions are such that the traffic from Europe to South America is naturally larger than from the United States to South America. The most profitable passenger business, and perhaps the most profitable business of any kind, that a trans-Atlantic steamship enjoys is that of carrying steerage passengers. That is point No. 1.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I will yield to the Senator from Delaware in just a minute; I want to answer the question of the Senator from Nebraska.

There is a very large migration from points in Europe to South America, going from Lisbon and the northern ports of Europe to Brazil, to some extent to Argentina, and a very large migration from Italy to the Argentine Republic. That makes it possible to put on boats that are larger and that are of a more expensive type than those from New York to Rio de Janerio and the Argentine Republic. That is point No. 1. They have an established business taking care of this emigration.

No. 2. The return cargoes are more abundant, especially from Argentina, than they are to the United States. The products of the Argentine Republic and of Uuruguay—Uruguay is, perhaps, the fourth country commercially in South America, although it is small in size—are competitors with our own in the case of wheat, meats, and, to some small extent, corn. Any boat sailing from Europe to any one of those ports would have a far better opportunity for a return cargo to Europe than it would to the United States. Indeed, I am compelled to say that this promises, at the present time at least, to be a permanent disad-vantage resting upon passenger through lines between New York and South America—at least, to the east coast—as compared with boats from Europe.

Mr. NORRIS. What the Senator has said in regard to passengers going first to Europe applies also to the freight, does it not, to a great extent?

Mr. BURTON. Not by any means to the same extent.

Mr. NORRIS. How far does it apply?

Mr. BURTON. I quoted—and the Senator from Nebraska will find it on pages 1189 and 1190 of the RECORD—a statement showing the sailings, first, of the Prince Line, from January 1, 1914, to September 30; and, second, of steamers dispatched from New York to Brazil and the River Plata. It appeared, as regards the Prince Line, that the sailings during this time, which were two to four a month, in every single instance, before the war and after the war, were made with a very large amount of empty cargo space. The most notable——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. In just a minute. The most notable illustration was the sailing of the Portuguese Prince August 2. It had 175,500 cubic feet of unused space. That would mean a cargo capacity of nearly 4,500 tons, which, I take it, is considerably more than half the carrying capacity of the boat. It also appears that of boats sailing from New York to this part of South America—Brazil and the Argentine Republic—there were 96 voyages in 9 months, an average of a little more than 10 per month. Now I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. DU PONT. The Senator from Ohio has anticipated the answer to the question I was going to propound. I was going to ask if it was the fact that vessels sailing from New York directly to South America had been loaded to their full capacity.

Mr. BURTON. In no case. While I am on that point let me read what was said in the joint letter of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce, transmitted here and printed December 29 last, on pages 10 and 11, beginning toward the bottom of page 10:

> As a matter of fact, the demand for cargo space to South American ports is not sufficient to fill the steamers which are leaving for such ports. It is a notable fact that many of the South American lines are sending boats out of New York, frequently after a long detention, in order to secure a proper cargo, with vacant space. Mr. Lilly, of Norton, Lilly & Co., pointed out that last year his company had 17 steamship sailings from New York to the River Plata. This year this company has had only 10 steamship sailings. The steamship San Francisco, of this company, has been held in New York since November 16 waiting for a cargo. This steamer should have sailed December 5, but it is not expected that a sufficient cargo will be secured until toward the first of the year.

This is from a letter in which the passage of this bill is advocated, and yet they state in the clearest language that there is an abundance of shipping now to the east coast of South America.

I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Florida now.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to submit to the Senator from Ohio in all fairness if it is not true that the statement just made, and which the Senator made the other day and which he gave figures to substantiate, that ships sailing from New York to South American ports with so much space unoccupied really means nothing. A ship may be loaded down to her mark and still have a large amount of cubic space unoccupied. Is not that the case?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no. This statement is intended to show the actual capacity for carrying cargo. Every 40 cubic feet that is not occupied would mean empty space for a ton of freight.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely; that was not occupied.

Mr. BURTON. This much is correct in what the Senator from Florida suggests. I suppose in an ordinary voyage there is a certain amount of space which it is not expected to fill; but the amount here is, in almost every case, exceptional.

Mr. FLETCHER. I simply submit that a statement showing unoccupied space and the argument that there was a showing of that kind does not mean that the ship might not have been absolutely loaded to her limit.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, not to her limit.

Mr. FLETCHER. She might have plenty of cubic space unoccupied and still be carrying all the load that the law would allow her to carry.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no. As I have stated, this table was prepared with a view of showing the amount of cargo in tons, which, without loading her below her proper load line, she could have carried. The same is true, while I am on this subject, of shipments to the west coast of South America. In this case also there is the same abundance of tonnage. As I believe I stated the other day, there has been a very considerable falling off in the demand by South America for heavy freight. The railway building is in a measure suspended. The provisions for lighting plants and other public utilities which would be made in case of favorable conditions there have fallen off; and that is a condition not altogether caused by the war, but is due to financial conditions in the leading countries of South America, which have reduced their purchasing power.

I have noticed a statement frequently that trade follows the flag. I may some time wish to argue that proposition. It is a kind of shibboleth used by extreme protectionists. I concede a certain amount of force in that expression, whether you use it with reference to trade with colonies where the flag of the mother country floats or whether, as it is more commonly used, you apply it to the flag of the boat and its ownership. But instead of laying down a general rule that trade follows the flag, it is nearer to the truth to say that the flag follows trade; and still nearer, especially in the conditions that prevail in a new country, that trade follows the extension of credit by an older country to a newer one.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator a question for information. The Senator has been telling us about ships that ply between this country and Brazil having a great deal of unoccupied space. Has the Senator investigated with a view to finding out whether those plying directly between this country and Europe do not have under ordinary circumstances a good deal of unoccupied space?

Mr. BURTON. Under certain conditions at certain seasons of the year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is it not rather a rare thing that a freighter from this country to any country is filled to its full capacity?

Mr. BURTON. I would say that in the case of passenger boats they may quite frequently depart with unoccupied cargo space.

Mr. SIMMONS. They are combined passenger and freight.

Mr. BURTON. The fast passenger lines carry mail and carry express freight, and do not depend so largely on coarser freight. I say further, as I said to the Senator from Florida, that under normal conditions it would hardly be expected that a boat would be loaded to the maximum on every trip.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is it not also true that if a vessel is loaded with some very heavy freight she may be loaded to her carrying capacity and yet have a good deal of unoccupied space?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; if the freight were heavy as compared with its bulk.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; say lead or iron. While she would be loaded to the extent of her carrying capacity, yet she might have a great deal of space left.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; that would be true. These figures were, however, prepared with a view to showing the amount of freight which should normally be carried, and it was thought the amount of cubic space afforded the best indication of carrying capacity. In two or three instances boats went to Norfolk to take on coal for the voyage, because it was thought desirable to fill in the unused space with coal for the round trip, it being possible to obtain coal there more cheaply than in South America.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator let me ask him another question? The Senator said a little while ago that there was considerable indirect intercourse between this country and Brazil and other South American countries; that is, it went to Europe and then back to Brazil. That, he said, was true both of freight and of passengers.

Mr. BURTON. Much more of passengers than of freight.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is true also of mail matter?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; to a certain extent.

Mr. SIMMONS. A good deal of mail matter from this country to South America is carried first to Europe and then from Europe to South America. Why is that? Is it because it can go quicker? A passenger can not only have better accommodations but he can go quicker——

Mr. BURTON. I can not answer that.

Mr. SIMMONS. By way of Europe than he can directly from the United States to South America.

Mr. BURTON. That question can not be answered categorically.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is not that true with reference to a cargo? Of course, time is very much the essence of transportation. Is it not true that cargoes from this country destined to South America can frequently reach there quicker by going first to Europe and then to South America?

Mr. BURTON. That depends upon the boat. Suppose a boat sails on the 1st, the 11th, and the 21st of each month directly to South America and makes the usual time—17 days—to Rio, Santos, Barbados, Trinidad, and to Pernambuco, and perhaps to Bahia. No shipment could be made by way of Europe to surpass that in shortness of time. But suppose between the interval of steamers making the trip of 17 days it is desired to forward freight, in view of the fact that it would be a week or two weeks, perhaps, before there would be a through fast boat, the freight could then be sent quicker by way of Europe. I am satisfied, although I do not make the assertion with the utmost confidence, that the custom of transshipment by way of Europe is much less in vogue than it was formerly; that is, it is just like every other line of freight which responds to demands, and as our trade to South America increases the facilities increase.

Mr. SIMMONS. Obviously, if the Senator will permit me, if a boat starting from here went directly to South America at the same speed, it would go there very much quicker than it would go by way of Europe. But, as a matter of fact, boats going from here to Europe and from Europe to South America have regular sailing days, have regular schedules, and are generally fast boats, while boats going from here to South America have no regular sailing days.

Mr. BURTON. Two lines maintain regular sailings.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know they have no regular schedules in many cases, and they have stopping points; as a matter of fact, as I have understood it, in many cases it is found much more expeditious for either a person or his cargo to go by way of Europe to South America than to rely upon the irregular service that we have directly between here and South American ports.

Mr. BURTON. That is due to a condition which is easily explained. There are not passengers enough to justify sailings to South America except with a certain degree of frequency. The Lamport & Holt Line sent out a boat every week until this struggle came. Recently by lack of freight and passengers they have been sending boats out less frequently. Before that line was established the facilities for reaching South America were much inferior to what they are now, due largely to the fact that there was not enough passenger traffic to justify a high-grade service. The question arises, How are you going to help that condition with a Government line? If you can not afford to send ships that make fast time, and that is the situation after years of trial, what are you going to do? Are you going to put a Government line on there and run it at a big loss; run it whether there is freight or not?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that so far as I am concerned I shall hope very much if this bill passes that we will have a regular line controlled by the Government between here and Brazil with just as good passenger accommodations and just as good freight accommodations and just as quick schedules as boats running from here to Europe. Now let me ask the Senator another question.

Mr. BURTON. Let me make a remark right there. If that be the case, why not run to South Africa? Why not run to New Zealand? If you have rapid-running steamships, why not establish service to other countries of the world?

Mr. SIMMONS. We will not run them simply for the purpose of having rapid steamships, but we will run them for the purpose of having adequate steamships.

Mr. BURTON. What is going to be your policy about it? Are you going to run them with the idea that it is a good plan to run ships to every part of the world, irrespective of traffic, or are you going to run your boats where there is traffic to justify it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I would run them for the purpose of accommodating the present traffic. I would run them for the purpose of building up additional traffic. The lack of trade that there is between this country and these great countries to the south of us is because of the lack of adequate transportation.

But I did not rise to get into a debate with the Senator. I wanted to get some information from him. I want to direct his mind to this point, because I should like to have his views upon it. I know he has studied this question pretty carefully.

The Senator has said that there are not sufficient cargoes to fill the boats that are already available running directly between here and South America. He has said that there was a large part of the traffic between here and South America that went by way of Europe for one reason or the other.

I will ask the Senator this question: Suppose all the traffic between this country and the countries of South America were provided with adequate transportation and quick transportation for passengers and freight, does he not suppose that this triangular process would cease, and the ceasing of that would stop the present methods of carrying half or a third or a fourth of the freight and passengers from here to South America by way of Europe and then to South America? If it were all concentrated directly between here and South America, would it not very greatly increase the tonnage of vessels plying directly between this country and South American countries?

Mr. BURTON. I am not so sure about that. There would still be a certain amount of traffic that would go around that way, particularly of passengers; but, as it seems to me, with the greatest respect, the fallacy of the argument of the Senator from North Carolina is that you are to put on boats irrespective of the demand for them. You can not do business in that way. You can not send boats to South America or establish a line like the Cunard Line, with the Mauretania or the Lusitania, and make it profitable. You must adapt your transportation facilities to the demands of trade.

Mr. SIMMONS. Would the Senator from Ohio think, therefore, that a railroad company should not build a road anywhere until there was sufficient traffic already developed to that place to make the railroad profitable?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, railroads are built in anticipation of the growth of trade, and just so are steamship lines. Steamship lines have already been established to South America, in anticipation that they would build up traffic. There is no difficulty about that, but the service established must have some regard for the reasonable expectation of traffic.

I say again that it is my impression, though I can not speak with entire confidence that the triangular traffic, so called, has very much diminished in recent years. The reason for its existence hitherto is partly personal preference of passengers and the convenience of shippers, and more, perhaps, because the traffic has not been sufficient to justify the highest grades of accommodations.

Why, Mr. President, I very boldly make the prediction that if the Government should put on a line to South America of the same high standard as the lines to Europe they would soon find that it would prove an extravagant and wasteful experiment.

As regards traffic with the west coast of South America, there is a point that assumes the utmost importance which should be taken into account—that is the conclusion of the work on the Panama Canal. This canal greatly increases the efficiency of each unit of shipping plying from New York to and from all Atlantic and Gulf ports and to most of the ports of South America. For instance, the round trip from New York to Callao, the principal port of Peru, involves a sailing of 20,000 miles. With the opening of the Panama Canal it is 10,000 miles. That does not mean that a boat can make twice as many trips from New York to Callao as before, but it does mean a greatly increased efficiency in the transportation of freight between those two places. For instance—this reason will appeal to the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]—you can not make twice as many trips, because there are certain stops which must be made, and those stops will still occupy the same amount of time, but the sailing distance and the time required therefor would be cut in two.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just at this point I wish to ask does not the fact that the Panma Canal has substantially reduced the sailing distance one-half force us to the conclusion that we will need fewer ships to do whatever business there is between our country and South America than we have for that purpose under existing conditions?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly; and that is now making its influence felt.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true.

Mr. BURTON. There is also another factor. The Chilean and Peruvian Governments are placing a line on the west coast of South America. Is there not a British line which has been in operation for many years from Panama south? The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] will understand about that. How many steamers have they?

Mr. PERKINS. About 13.

Mr. BURTON. They have, of course, been interfered with somewhat by the war; but the line is still running ships.

There is one point which I neglected to explain in answering the question of the Senator from Nebraska as to the reason for the wide disparity between the number of boats belonging to the Lloyd-Brazileiro, or the Brazilian Line, and the number engaged in through traffic from New York to Brazil. Perhaps four-fifths of those boats are used for local traffic along the coast of Brazil. I started to explain that, but some question intervened and I did not conclude my statement.

There are a number of ports which by reason of their shallowness would shut out large-sized boats such as would make the trip from New York down south of the Equator. Another reason, perhaps even more substantial, is that a sufficient cargo could not be obtained to make it worth while to stop at any of these numerous small ports. Thus the freight is carried in large boats from New York to Pernambuco or Bahia or Rio, or perhaps Santos, and it is distributed from those points by transshipping from a large boat to a smaller one or by placing it in the warehouse; and on some occasions it is carried by smaller boats of those lines into the domestic or local ports.

In this connection, Mr. President, I wish to present a list of questions, which I trust will be answered at an early date by the advocates of this bill. I shall read them and then take them up one by one and comment upon them. They are as follows:

1. Will it be the policy of the Government to select a special route for such ships? On what route is a line to be established?

2. If so, what will be the determining factors in selecting the route?

3. Will the choice be determined with a view to getting any particular American commodity to market? If so, what product; and what will be the determining factors in the selection?

4. What American port or ports will be adopted as the export and import points, and what will be the rule for determining the choice?

5. Will the desire to build up new trade be the determining factor? If so, how will this be accomplished?

6. Will it be the policy to operate the boats on a profit or no-profit basis? If on a no-profit basis, will it not drive all American shipping off the routes invaded? If on a profit basis, can you demonstrate on what routes and by what economic saving this can be accomplished to better advantage than by private shipping?

7. Will boats be required to follow definite routes; that is, will the plan be to establish a line of steamers with regular schedules, or will the steamers be left free to accept charters at will? If so, will they not engage in the world's random trade and not offer any definite assurance of promoting American exports and imports?

8. Where is the Government to secure its ships? If by construction, can they be secured soon enough to relieve the so-called emergency? If by purchase, from whom?

9. If the purchase of interned vessels is contemplated, will it not prejudice the quality of our neutrality? If such purchase were at all feasible, could it not be accomplished with less prejudice by private capital than by public capital?

10. If the desire is to build up an American merchant marine, will not this bill defeat its own purpose by driving private capital out of the business? Is there not a larger amount of private capital ready for the purchase of ships which is kept from investment by this bill than is contemplated to be expended by the bill itself?

11. Should the almost impossible happen and the Government-owned line prove profitable, to whom would it be sold?

12. Will the managers of this Government line enter into conferences or agreements with existing lines?

13. Will boats be acquired for special service, such as the carriage of fruit, meat, or oil?

14. Will the policy of the Government be to operate the boats through the proposed corporation or to charter them to private parties?

There is one question at the very beginning that assumes great importance in this matter: Is this to be a permanent or a temporary policy? It seems to me we are entitled to know what is intended by those who insist upon the enactment of this measure.

It is of the utmost importance that it should be definitely understood whether the provisions of this bill are intended to correct an immediate emergency in the shipping trade or whether they are intended to inaugurate a permanent policy. Without knowing definitely what is intended, it is impossible to determine the adequacy or desirability of the means proposed. These propositions are so entirely different that they can not be met with equal efficiency by the same economic facilities. For example, if a temporary emergency only is contemplated, the essence of the relief is that it shall be immediate and instantly potent. Delay would defeat entirely its adequacy. If a real emergency exists which can be remedied only by Government agency, then the Government would be justified in a course of action which could not be justified under less imperative conditions. If there were any possible way of securing ships, it might be defensible to pay under such circumstances more than their real commercial value. It should be noted, however, that to provide immediate relief it is necessary to secure additional tonnage. No mere transfer of tonnage will be of any avail.

If, on the other hand, it is desired to establish a permanent policy, then the minutest consideration should be given to its economic features. Every detail of business economy in building, purchasing, equipping, and operating such fleet should be exercised. For the Government to go into such an enterprise with less consideration than this would be indefensible. If such a policy is contemplated, then the present time is most inopportune for its inauguration. There has not been a moment since the Civil War when boats could not be secured to better advantage than at present. The Government could not buy a single bottom without paying from 50 to 100 per cent more than it is actually worth. The expense of building under present conditions is also considerably above normal. The slightest consideration of prevailing conditions must make it evident to anyone familiar with the shipping business that a permanent policy of Government ownership could not be initiated under more unfavorable auspices.

It is for considerations of this sort that it is absolutely imperative that the Senate should be given the fullest assurance as to what the real policy is of those who are insisting on the enactment of a ship-purchase bill. Only then can the Senate proceed to any intelligent consideration of the question. To mix the proposals produces an impossible situation.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this assumes primary importance at the very start. Exactly what is intended? Is it intended simply to meet this emergency, or is the Government embarking on a policy of owning a considerable amount of shipping? If it is to meet the emergency, how are you going to do it?

I will take up more in detail the questions which I have enumerated. Will it be the policy of the Government to select a special route for such ships? If so, on what route is a line to be established? In my remarks on the 7th of January I asked the question, "Where is the route on which you propose to place these ships?" In reply, we were informed that that was a question for the shipping board to determine, and it was said, "We will cross that bridge when we come to it." Well, Mr. President, we have reached that bridge already. Should not the advocates of this bill tell us where, in the multitude of routes extending over the entire globe, is there one on which you can place ships acquired under this bill?

The first agitation for the measure was on behalf of an increased trade with South America; but your own Secretary of the Treasury and your Secretary of Commerce have negatived that proposition, for they say that boats find it hard to obtain cargoes for South American ports; that a boat which was to have sailed on the 5th of December had not left port on the 29th of December because of the lack of freight. Therefore there is manifestly no need for any boats to those ports. Will it be to Java or to Hongkong and Calcutta? There does not seem to be any scarcity there. Indeed, they will probably have a surplus of boats to spare from that trade, which is very well established, to transfer for service across the Atlantic. They would have transferred them before this except for the fact that owners of shipping lines do not wish to suddenly change the established routes which they have adopted and for which they have been long furnishing facilities.

Another reason is found in the hope that the present war will not be of long duration.

To make this appropriation and leave it to any shipping board is too much like the blind pools which speculators form, when some one of financial standing says, "I want a couple of million dollars; I can buy some stocks at a profit." He is asked, "What are you going to do?" "Oh, I will not tell," he replies; "the enterprise is of so confidential a nature that I must refuse to tell what it is; you must put your money into a pool with mine and permit me to determine what disposition shall be made of it."

In the appropriations which we make for different objects Congress has always insisted on knowing the purposes for which the money is to be expended. Thus far in this debate not a word has been said by the proponents of this measure as to where these boats would be used. I asked whether they were for South America and China. Or do you intend to put on a line of boats running to Bremen? Is it desirable to send boats over that route, which for 150 miles is strewn with floating mines, many of which have probably broken loose from their original anchorage and are liable, without a moment's warning, to send a ship to the bottom and all the men on it to eternity?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Is not the reason the Senator is now giving a very good one why we should not determine these routes?—because these vessels may not be ready for six months or a year, we will assume for the sake of the argument, and the Senator is now speaking of the fact that the sea is strewn with mines in many places. Of course, if it is strewn with mines now a vessel should not be put on a given route. If the route that is in contemplation six months hence should be strewn with mines, clearly the board that has control ought not to place the vessels where they would be in jeopardy.

Mr. BURTON. In other words, disregarding present conditions, the boats are to be built for the routes where they may be required 6 or 12 months hence. By the way, the suggestion of my colleague does not allow sufficient time for their construction. For boats of any considerable capacity it requires at least 9, 10, or 12 months before they can be made ready for the sea. In its last analysis you are simply saying, "Eliminate all the routes; we have at present no routes where it is desirable to place them now, but just give us the money, and we will build the ships, and by that time there will exist routes on which they can be profitably used."

In this troublous time, when so large a share of the world is convulsed with war, if any man can look into the vista of the future and tell where there will be a profitable route 9 months hence or 12 months hence, he is endowed with a wisdom denied to mere mortals.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it occurs to me that it is just because we do not have that wisdom now that we should not decide now what we will do a year hence.

Mr. BURTON. What is my colleague's idea—may I ask—that we should buy boats or build them?

Mr. POMERENE. My thought is to buy, if we can; to build, if we must. As I read the public prints to-day, it seems to me that the one question which confronts the business public now is that we have not the necessary means of transportation. That is an established fact; and that being so, the first step is to provide means of transportation. When the Government has these vessels, we can then determine where to place them so as to get the best use out of them.

Mr. BURTON. That, Mr. President, is piling uncertainty upon uncertainty. "We know of no route now where they could be used. But we recognize a certain emergency, and when we are through building them we will know where to send them."

I submit that if we are going to commit this country to such a course as this we ought to know now where these ships are to be obtained.

In the first place, it is said, "Buy some." Is there some place where the Government of the United States can buy ships, but where private individuals can not buy them? Is there some hidden harbor or cove in some remote portion of the world where these vessels are moored and where Government agents alone will find them? I assert with the utmost confidence that not merely forty millions—the amount it is expected the Government will invest in ships—would have been invested by this time by private capital in vessels to carry American produce, but one hundred millions would have been so invested, except for the inevitable feeling in the business world that they can not compete with the United States. It is an effective check upon every plan for enlarging the merchant marine of the United States, because the policy to be pursued by the Government is a mystery locked in the breasts of a few men not yet even selected.

Nobody knows what you propose to do. Do you intend to run these boats at a loss and operate them at such low rates that private shipping will be driven from the ocean? That is one possibility. Are you going to pick out the best and most fruitful routes and run the boats on those alone, saying to American shipping: "You shall have the remainder, the skim milk, as it were, and we will take the cream."

With these questions undecided, no company or private individual is willing to proceed, however much he may desire to engage in the business—a business in which perhaps he has been engaged all his life and in which, except for this threat, he sees now a golden opportunity for advancement. If we answer this question in the negative, I am confident that there will be a larger number of boats sailing the ocean under the American flag than if we pass this measure, and that the facilities for shipments will be far superior to what they now are.

Why, it seems to me that Congress, in the exercise of its prerogatives—this Congress that sometimes demands to know what use is to be made of the paltry sum of a thousand dollars—should know what is to be done with the thirty or forty millions which we are asked to deliver into their hands without being admitted to their confidence. We are driven to the conclusion that if you do not tell us for what you are going to use it you do not know yourselves, and that there is no useful purpose to which it can be applied.

It is true that heretofore large sums have been placed in the hands of the President, as in the case of the Panama Canal, but it was to accomplish a definite object, clearly understood, and approved by the American people. Yet here we are told that we must leave it to this board to use their discretion, and that we must indeed wait until the boats are built. Why, we fervently hope that when the time has passed within which ships could be built the drums of war will have ceased to beat, and every boat now blockaded in the harbors of any nation will weigh anchor and again set sail, resuming its place along the great routes of trade, and furnishing a supply which shall be ample for the shipping of the entire world.

If there is any business enterprise that would be foolish at this time, it is that of building ships with the uncertainties incident thereto, with their increased cost, and with the probablity that when they are finished there will be no use for them.

What will be the determining factor in establishing the route? How are you going to settle that? Are you going to put on boats to carry wheat, cotton, and meat? If so, are you going to build boats expressly for the purpose of carrying meat, or are you intending to buy them? Shipping is now highly specialized. One class of boats, with their refrigerator chambers, are built to carry fruit; another to carry meat, with the same facilities for refrigeration; and another to carry oil. If the Government goes into the shipping business, it should make provision for all these varied kinds of trade. Is this enterprise intended for the cotton grower alone? Is it for the wheat producer alone? Or is it for the meat producer alone? Why, you might spend all of your money, and before you were through you might not have enough to carry the wheat, the corn, or even the cotton that is shipped from this country.

Do you propose to help one trade or one line of production alone? And if so, is that fair to the American people? From what ports are you going to send out these ships? Will New Orleans, whose chamber of commerce has protested against this bill, have them all, or the bulk of them? Will they all sail from Galveston? Or will they, as is the usual tendency, concentrate at New York?

You can not sail from one port one week and from another port another week. If the business is to be conducted profitably, if you are going to obtain freight for your vessels, those who manage this proposed line must keep track of the trade in each locality. Must Galveston complain because New Orleans gets all the ships? Must Boston be left to say, "We are being ignored, and all these ships are going to other ports"?

These questions show the futility of the plan under which it is proposed to enter the shipping business, unless you handle all the commerce which offers. If you take part of it, you are doing an injustice to a great majority of the industries of the country and favoring one or even a few of these industries. You are doing an injustice to the great majority of the ports of the country, and again favoring but one or a few of them.

I presume it will be said, "We will send the boats as they are needed." Yes; but who will know where they are needed? One port may say, "There is a scarcity of shipping here." The shipping agents may say, "If there is a scarcity of shipping there, it is because there is not enough freight to make it profitable, or because they are unwilling to pay the natural prices on traffic from that port." Will you empower a political board to decide all those questions?

I must say, Mr. President, that I think there is a very rational ground for apprehension about leaving the decision of those questions to any political body. Some months ago, when the question of the location of regional banks was before us, I expressed my belief that it would be better if we passed a resolution that no Member of this body should go before the organization board to urge any place for such a bank. I believed it would be better to leave to the board the decision as to the proper localities, because every one of us knows, and the people know, that when you leave those questions to a political board there is bound to be favoritism.

Now, there are certain questions which settle themselves, and settle themselves correctly. One of these is the normal relation between demand and supply. For illustration, if the place where a boat is needed to ship freight, and the kind of freight which ought to be carried be left to this normal law of trade, all will be well. But if you appoint a board, and introduce resolutions in the Senate and the House to learn why did we not send the Dacia to Charleston or the Prince Joachim to Galveston, and permit Senators and Representatives to importune the dispatch of boats to particular points, there is sure to be trouble.

So, if you establish this kind of a corporation and buy a few boats, perhaps one-fourteenth of the number that are needed, you can not manage the enterprise without favoritism. You can not manage it without conferring a benefit on some interest or locality to the prejudice of all the rest.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I want to call his attention to the steamship facilities that we now have between this country and South America. A friend of mine who is very well versed in this matter has given me a list of the steamship lines, and if it will not interrupt the Senator I should like to read them.

Mr. BURTON. To South America?

Mr. GALLINGER. To South America.

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad to have them read. I think I mentioned all of them except the Lloyd Brazileiro in a table I gave the other day, but it will be well to repeat them.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator must have omitted some. There is the Red D Line, with which the Senator is familiar.

Mr. BURTON. Yes. That does not go to Brazil. That only goes as far as Venezuela.

Mr. GALLINGER. To Venezuela; yes. There is the United States & Brazil Steamship Line, an American line.

Mr. BURTON. That is a United States Steel Corporation Line, and carries their products largely.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. There is the United Fruit Co., an American line; the New York-South American Line, an American line; the Luckenback Line, an American line; the Booth Steamship Co.; the Lamport & Holt Line; the Royal Dutch Line; the Quebec Steamship Co.; the Trinidad Line; W. R. Grace & Co.——

Mr. BURTON. They sail to the west coast.

Mr. GALLINGER. To the west coast—the Prince Line; the Lloyd Brazileiro Line; the Funch Edye Line; the Houston Line; the Barber Line; the Houlder, Wiere & Boyd Line; Wessels, Duval & Co.; the Merchants' Line; the Seeberg Line; and the Munson Steamship Line.

Of course some of those do not go to the farther ports, but they are all between our country and South America. I will ask the Senator if in his investigations—and very little has escaped the Senator from Ohio in this matter, he has discovered the fact that there is not a port of South America, with the exception of Rio, where a ship drawing more than 23½ feet can enter?

Mr. BURTON. They are changing so rapidly that I would not dare make that statement now. I think some are deeper than that.

Mr. GALLINGER. The information I have is very recent. I suppose the Senator knows that those ships in that trade are built upon a model somewhat different from the ordinary ships. They are broader beamed and lighter draft. So it is necessary to build ships of that type, or, if we bought ships for that trade, we would have to reconstruct them all at a very great cost.

Mr. BURTON. That is another reason which should be conclusive against putting on ships of the most advanced type, like those that sail between the United States and Europe, some of which draw nearly 40 feet and require very deep and wide harbors. It is not merely a matter of draft. They are unwilling to go into ports unless there is ample room to maneuver, as shown by the fact that the Cunard Line has recently declined to stop its boats at Queenstown because of the danger in entering that port.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. OLIVER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. FLETCHER. I raise the point of order that there has been no business transacted since the last call was made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has decided heretofore that unless business shall have intervened since the last roll call disclosing a quorum the point of order is well taken. There has been no intervening business since the last roll call disclosed a quorum. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FLETCHER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and on this question I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when Mr. VARDAMAN'S name was called). The junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the affirmative). When I voted I inadvertently overlooked the fact that the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is not present. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am paired with that Senator and withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JAMES. Has the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (after having voted in the negative). I voted, not noticing that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] is not present. I have a general pair with that Senator. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] and vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—11.

Brandegee	Nelson	Perkins	Stephenson
Bristow	Oliver	Poindexter	Warren

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question recurs on the motion to adjourn upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I will announce my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). Transferring my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I make the same transfer as before and vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Unless it is necessary for me to vote, I will observe my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I find he is not present. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the same announcement which I made on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. In his absence I would withhold my vote, but inasmuch as a quorum appears not to have voted I ask to have my vote recorded. I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask to have my vote recorded. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 6, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—6.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the absentees be called, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the list of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. PAGE and Mr. REED responded to their names when called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 45 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that I ask for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All in favor of the motion will rise. [After a pause.] Those opposed will rise. [After a pause.] The division shows that the ayes have it, and the Senate stands——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has heretofore ruled, and thinks he was sustained by the Senate, that when the question of a division arises it is simply for the information of the Chair, and if it is desirable the absence of a quorum can be disclosed by a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is not a motion to adjourn. This is a motion to take a recess, and it can not be done except by a quorum of the Senate. If it were a motion to adjourn, it undoubtedly could be declared carried.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The last roll call disclosed a quorum of the Senate present. A motion was made to take a recess. There was simply a request for a division, which was had for the information of the Chair, and the Chair decided that the motion was carried.

Mr. GALLINGER. I take an appeal from that decision, and I want to be heard on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is whether the ruling of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the Senate. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate sustains the ruling of the Chair. The Senate stands in recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

Thereupon (at 6 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m., Monday, January 18, 1915), the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 19, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God bless us all, for we all need Thy blessing and Thy help. We are weak; Thou art almighty. We know only a little; Thou knowest all things. We are a mixture of good and evil; Thou are infinitely pure and holy. Impart unto us wisdom, strength, purity, that we may reach the highest results in our calling, satisfy the best that is in us, and accomplish Thy commands; in the spirit of Him who taught us Thy will and left us an example worthy of all emulation. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, January 16, 1915, was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CANTOR, for one week, on account of the death of his son.

To Mr. GARRETT of Texas, for three days, on account of illness in his family.

GOVERNMENT AID TO HOME OWNERS.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Government aid to home owners, both farm and city.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of aid to home owners. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a communication received from the Boston Chamber of Commerce; also some suggestions in regard to the upbuilding of the American merchant marine and an article written by myself published in the New York World on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing certain resolutions passed by the Boston Chamber of Commerce and also an article which he himself wrote, published in the New York World, on the subject of improving the American merchant marine. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PLAZA AWARDS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, about a week ago unanimous consent was given that Senate joint resolution 129, relative to the Plaza Commission, be stricken from the calendar and that the resolution lie upon the table. I find it still upon the Union Calendar, and I repeat the request.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the resolution will be stricken from the calendar.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I also ask unanimous consent that House joint resolution 308, relating to the same subject, be stricken from the calendar and that the resolution lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that House joint resolution 308 be stricken from the calendar, and that it lie on the table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing resolutions adopted by Branch No. 520 of the Polish National Alliance, of Toledo, Ohio, on the Smith-Burnett immigration bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing resolutions on the Burnett immigration bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

OLD POST OFFICE, JERSEY CITY, N. J.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9584) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to sell the present old post office and the site thereof in the city of Jersey City, N. J.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the completion of the new Federal building at Jersey City, N. J., and its occupancy by the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to sell the present old post office and site thereof in said city, after proper advertisement, at public or private sale, on such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, strike out, after the word "discretion," the following words: "sell the present old post office and site thereof in said city, after proper advertisement, at public or private sale, on such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "offer at public sale, after proper advertisement, the present old post office and site in said city, and sell the same to the highest and best bidder."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, when this bill was up before, I think, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL] was going to get a statement from the Treasury Department of the value of this site and propose an amendment fixing an upset price.

Mr. HAMILL. I have such a letter, Mr. Speaker, and in the opinion of the Treasury Department this property should be sold at not less than $25,000. I have drawn an amendment to that effect.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman get an estimate of the value from the official taxing or assessing board?

Mr. HAMILL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What do they say the value is?

Mr. HAMILL. The actual valuation of the land, as made by the tax assessors of Jersey City, is $21,700.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman proposes to offer an amendment fixing the upset price at $25,000?

Mr. HAMILL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the basis of the appraisement in Jersey City as to its valuation?

Mr. HAMILL. The full value.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAMILL. I ask unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word, and is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to a speech delivered on December 30, 1914, by a Member of this House, the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. GEORGE J. KINDEL, and circulated separately, in which he says:

What if we had a captain of industry like Mr. Ford, of automobile fame; Mr. Wanamaker, of department-store fame; Mr. Woolworth, of the tallest-building fame, at the head of our Postal System. With a man of their caliber as our Postmaster, how long would political hacks such as our Third Assistant Postmaster continue feeding at the public crib?

What valuable service has he rendered to entitle him to a perpetual meal ticket at the hands of our Government?

Mr. Speaker, that comment is as foolish as it is unjust. The Third Assistant Postmaster General of the United States is the Hon. Alexander Monroe Dockery, of Missouri. I notice in this speech, on the front page, something that I never saw on a speech before in my life:

I will mail to commercial or economic bodies, at 75 cents per hundred, or single copies at 1-cent postage stamp.

Now, I assume that if people are required to pay for copies of this speech it will not have a very large circulation, even though the fool killer is considerably behind with his work. But I want to invite the attention of the House, especially the Members who do not know the Third Assistant Postmaster General personally, to the fact that he served for 8 consecutive terms—16 years—as a Member of this House. During that service he was a towering figure on the floor of the House of Representatives. He served on the great Committee on Appropriations of this House. His distinguished services are still evident in all the executive departments of the Government.

Among his other legislative activities he was the author of the celebrated Dockery Act, which for the first time put the accounting system of the Federal Government on a business basis. The Dockery Act gave the Treasury Department the power to outline a uniform system of accounting for the various bureaus of the departments of the Government. Under that act the disbursements in the Treasury Department have been reduced lower and lower each year in proportion to the amount of money disbursed and the amount of business handled by that great department. The departments are still operating under the Dockery Act, which has saved thousands of dollars of the peoples' money.

Gov. Dockery retired from service in this House when he was elected by the people of Missouri as the governor of that great State in 1900. He served four years as governor. If he had not retired from representing his district to become governor, he would still be a commanding figure on the floor of this House, for he was greatly beloved by the people of his district and greatly reverenced and beloved by the people of Missouri.

To talk of a meal ticket in connection with the public services of a man like Mr. Dockery is absurd. His public services were at the call of the people of his district and of his State. When his term as governor expired he was out of public life for eight years, his private interests being ample to engage his attention.

He has never asked, and under no other circumstances than a request from the Democratic administration would he accept public service. He has accepted it to my personal knowledge at a personal loss to himself. The idea of a meal ticket has never entered into Mr. Dockery's service to the United States, and does not to-day. The present Postmaster General, who was a Member of this House at the time Mr. Dockery was a leader of the Democratic Party on this floor, invited him into the official family with the full knowledge that Mr. Dockery was one of the principal supporters of the Speaker of this House for the Presidency of the United States.

I know nothing of the dispute between Gov. Dockery and the gentleman from Colorado, except that I understand that Gov. Dockery is seeking to compel the gentleman from Colorado to pay the Government about $4,000 postage for alleged abuse of the franking privilege. Gov. Dockery, having been a Member of this House, knows the just rights of a Member in the use of the franking privilege. I am satisfied he would not call the gentleman from Colorado to account unless he had grounds to do so. As an honest and vigilant public servant he will not submit to an abuse of the franking privilege at the expense of the Public Treasury. Those of us who desire to see the franking privilege protected from abuse are inclined to support Gov. Dockery's action.

Mr. Dockery's services added luster to the Democratic side of this House; has added luster to the Democratic Party in the State of Missouri, and to-day adds luster to the Democratic administration in Washington; he is a man who never shirked a duty or betrayed a friend. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He needs no defense at my hands on the floor of this House, but I desired to take this opportunity to call these facts to the attention of the Members of this body. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KINDEL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KINDEL. To move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri made that motion.

Mr. KINDEL. Then I rise, Mr. Speaker, to oppose the amendment. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to note that Gov. Dockery has such a champion as we have just discovered in the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. What I meant to convey was that we put men in office who are positively not qualified for the position in which they are placed. Mr. Dockery himself told me that he did not know anything about the rates that were operating in the parcel post. He could not, to save his life, reconcile the present graduated rates on parcel post, and neither can the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] or anybody else. I contend that any man that will take a position that he does not know anything about is getting a meal ticket and not earning the money which he receives.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. DECKER. Does the parcel-post business come under Gov. Dockery's department?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. DECKER. In what way?

Mr. KINDEL. In the management of the receipts and the rules of the Post Office. Can the gentleman himself reconcile these rates?

Mr. DECKER. I am not talking about the rates. I want the gentleman to explain to the House in what way Mr. Dockery has the management of parcel post.

Mr. KINDEL. He is one of the heads of the department.

Mr. DECKER. Does it come under his department?

Mr. KINDEL. He told me I must pay $4,000 for putting a rubber stamp on some things I put out.

Mr. DECKER. Does it come under Mr. Dockery's department?

Mr. KINDEL. I told the gentleman in a general way that he is one of the heads of the department.

Mr. DECKER. Does the gentleman mean to give the impression that Mr. Dockery is not acquainted with the work and details of his department?

Mr. KINDEL. I emphatically say that he can not reconcile the parcel post's graduated rates upon which they work, and I will leave that challenge open to you or any other man.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. KINDEL. There is no use in asking any more questions, and I decline to yield any further. I have nothing against Mr. Dockery nor anybody else connected with the Post Office Department. I came here elected a Democrat, to help the country and to help the party, but I found it was utterly useless to get in on the transportation rates, although when I came here I had been studying and giving large attention to those matters for the past 25 years. In everything I have said there is no malice intended toward anybody. All I want to do is to improve the service, if it can be done. I have not made a speech on the floor at any time that I did not inject rates and rules on transportation into it. Mr. Dockery wanted to humiliate and ridicule me by presenting me with a bill for $4,000, because I had put a rubber stamp on a speech announcing the very fact that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has just said concerning the fool killer, and I repeat that speeches do cost money and that I am out of pocket, and if anybody wants more than one copy they must send a 1-cent stamp for each one. I think it would be money well invested and time well spent to study and digest my speech, and if you find anything for criticism in it, I am open to conviction. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, after line 4, insert "Provided, however, That said property shall not be sold for less than the sum of $25,000."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that that amendment is perfectly satisfactory to the committee.

The amendment of Mr. HAMILL was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAMILL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. LOUIS RIVER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 17762) to amend an act approved February 20, 1908, entitled "An act to authorize the Interstate Transfer Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the St. Louis River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. Has the War Department or the engineers of the War Department reported on this bill as yet?

Mr. LENROOT. Not any further than the gentleman is already aware of.

Mr. MILLER. Then they have sent in no formal report upon the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. Not that I know of.

Mr. MILLER. Does not the gentleman think that it is advisable that the consideration of this bill be postponed until such report is received?

Mr. LENROOT. No; but I shall not object if the gentleman makes that request.

Mr. MILLER. Under the circumstances, I think I shall have to ask the gentleman to request that it be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill which has been reported and the next bill on the calendar, H. R. 15727, be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that this bill and the next one on the calendar be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. I understand there is some controversy in respect to the matter that ought to be first settled.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that the condition as to the other bill which he mentions, the one that follows this on the calendar, is not at all the same as the bill that is now before us, because the Board of Engineers has reported upon that.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentlemen had agreed upon that. Then I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill just reported be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois whether this bill under the circumstances would retain its place upon the calendar or would it go to the bottom of the calendar?

Mr. MANN. I think it ought to retain its place on the calendar.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman think, because so many of these bills are passed over without prejudice, that they ought to go to the bottom of the calendar?

Mr. MANN. Of course when Members first began to ask unanimous consent to pass the bills over without prejudice, when the Unanimous Consent Calendar first went into effect, I objected; but in the course of time various good reasons were given for passing a particular bill, and that has been the custom from then on.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it prevents a lot of Members from having an opportunity to have their bills considered.

Mr. MANN. I do not care about the matter particularly. If the gentleman desires to object to this, I shall not quarrel with him, but then I shall object to passing any bills over without prejudice, under any circumstances.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not mean the first time.

Mr. MANN. If we are going to have that rule, we ought to treat everyone alike. I do not believe in making any distinction in respect to bills as between one Member and another. If the gentleman thinks the bill ought not to be passed over without prejudice, I certainly shall not quarrel with him, if he objects, but I shall object to passing any other bills.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall not object to passing any of them over without prejudice, but I submit that if we do it two or three times on the same bill——

Mr. MANN. Unless there is reason for it, it ought not to be done.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this bill likely to be disposed of on the next unanimous-consent day?

Mr. MANN. I do not know. I understand that they are waiting for a report from the War Department, and it ought to be in.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall not object at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there has been an understanding that this bill and the next bill on the calendar shall be considered as companion bills, and in view of my understanding that the gentleman from Minnesota would object if this bill were presented now, I ask unanimous consent to modify the request of the gentleman from Illinois by including the following bill, and that both bills be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have no objection particularly, because the gentleman from Wisconsin is, of course, ready to make the same objection to the next bill that I have made respecting this, but I do not think it fair to state that the two bills are companion bills.

Mr. LENROOT. I said it is the understanding that they shall be treated together.

Mr. MILLER. I do not quite agree with that. That has been the understanding in times past; but I wish the gentleman to know that if there is any doubt in his mind, regardless of whether the House sees fit to pass the bill or not, I am under the highest obligation and shall be insistent on every effort to consider the other bill. If the department is not able to report upon the gentleman's bill, I can see no reason why the House should not take action upon the bill that has been reported upon.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I want to say, in reply to the gentleman from Minnesota, that there was an understanding when these bills were recalled from the Senate that they should be considered together when considered at all.

Mr. MILLER. I had no such understanding with the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, as chairman representing the committee which has on this calendar so many bills, not knowing exactly what hands I may fall into and not desiring to make any enemies, as the candidate for membership in the church said when he was asked to renounce the devil and all his works, I will say nothing about the proposition of my friend from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] as to passing bills to the heel of the calendar; but I will say, as to this pending bill, there has been some conflict over the two bills—this and the next one—as between the two localities represented, respectively, by the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] and the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], but I think the crux of the difficulty is aimed at in this bill. Our committee recommended and Congress many years ago consented for a bridge. Our committee is now inclined to the opinion that the conditions of the consent of Congress have not been complied with by the company constructing the bridge.

The committee, after elaborate hearings, reported the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], to amend the original act. The War Department, however, had not up to that time concurred with the view of the committee; but I am informed that the War Department is undergoing a change of heart on the subject and that there is likely to come in a report favorable to the bill, and for that reason I think it wise that the matter stand in status quo for the present.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to passing this bill and the next one without prejudice? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

FALSE ADVERTISING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to pass without prejudice the bill H. R. 4931, a bill to prevent false advertising in the District of Columbia. I ask it at this time, Mr. Speaker, because when that bill was introduced the District attorney or the prosecuting attorney of the District of Columbia at the time thought it was necessary. The present District attorney doubts whether it is necessary or not, but his attention has only recently been called to the bill, and he would like to have further time to investigate it.

The SPEAKER. What is the calendar number of the bill?

Mr. DENT. It is H. R. 4931, Calendar No. 370.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to pass Unanimous Consent Calendar No. 370 without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

COMMISSION TO SURVEY CRATER BATTLE FIELD.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13923) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to appoint a commission to designate, define, and survey the battle field of the Crater at Petersburg, Va., and to collect certain data concerning the same and make report thereon.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill is ordered stricken from the calendar.

CERTAIN CLAIMS OF THE UNITED STATES AGAINST THE STATE OF TENNESSEE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was S. J. Res. 65, to amend S. J. Res. 34, approved May 12, 1898, entitled "Joint resolution providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee and certain claims against the United States."

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a request for unanimous consent that consideration of this resolution be passed without prejudice——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks to pass this resolution without prejudice.

Mr. HULL. For the reason that the Department of Justice has been working on information sought by the gentleman from Illinois and others and has not been able to complete this work, but we are hopeful the desired information may be brought in a little later on.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman, when the information is obtained, have it printed either in the RECORD or in some other form, so that it will be available for Members of the House?

Mr. HULL. I will be very glad to take that up with the gentlemen on the other side.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PUBLIC BUILDING, GRAND JUNCTION, COLO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4012) to increase the limit of cost of the United States public building at Grand Junction, Colo.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost of the United States public building at Grand Junction, Colo., be, and the same hereby is, increased from the sum of $100,000 to the sum of $200,000, said increase being necessary in order to complete the building according to the present plans and specifications.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Line 5, strike out "$200,000" and insert "$175,000."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, this matter has been up, and up, and the House has had some discussions on it once or twice before. The city of Grand Junction is the largest city in the western part of the State. I secured an appropriation some four and a half years ago for $100,000 to provide a public building there. The Supervising Architect has advertised three different times, and has never been able to get a bid that could be accepted. They can not build any kind of a suitable building for the present appropriation. The matter is at a standstill. It seems that it will be exceptionally expensive to get a suitable foundation. They report that it will cost some $30,000 to build a proper foundation.

Mr. FINLEY. Right there, let me ask the gentleman, is that the case in every part of the city of Grand Junction, that you have such trouble to get a proper foundation? Why not move the location?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; the whole city is underlaid with some alkali—it would do no good to change the site—they have to make an extensive construction there they claim to stand the weight of this kind of a public building. Furthermore, since the original appropriation was made the Government has established or extended the Reclamation Service there, and has increased the Weather Bureau and other Government functions there. The Treasury Department wants to provide for all of them at the same time, and this authorization only provides for a very plain brick building, while that city, I think, is entitled to a stone or marble building.

Mr. FINLEY. Well, what are the dimensions of the building upon which the plans and specifications have been made?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Eight thousand square feet of floor space, I believe. The report and its hearings give all the details very fully. This matter has been gone into exhaustively by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect and the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee, and the Treasury very earnestly recommended and tried to get $100,000 additional, whereas I am only asking for $75,000 in this bill.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say this to the gentleman, that this looks too much like a new proposition. It is 75 per cent a new proposition.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is not a new proposition. The original one has been pending and held off for nearly 10 years since we got the site, and nearly 5 years since I got this appropriation. That city is certainly entitled to a public building, and they never can get one until Congress appropriates enough for them to build a building large enough to hold the Government business there.

Mr. FINLEY. It has gone out all over this country that we are to have no public buildings bill this year.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman that if there are to be none of these bills passed this session I do not ask to have this one passed; I do not want any advantage over other equally meritorious bills, not at all. I will say now to the other Members of the House, if that is the program I will subscribe to it instantly. But we have, during the past six months, passed one or two bills of this kind, and there are several more of them on the calendar, and if we are going to pass others I do not want the House to make fish of one and fowl of another. I fully realize that we are all trying to economize in every way, and no one wants to make any appropriation that is not absolutely necessary as an emergency measure. We just passed one small bill somewhat similar to this.

Mr. FINLEY. I was not here when that bill passed; I was at my committee room.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say for the information of the gentleman from South Carolina that it is not the purpose of the committee to report any omnibus public buildings bill.

But we distinctly stated some time ago, and the committee came to that conclusion after hearings and after conferring with the Treasury officials and other officers of the Government, and even the President himself, that we would only report out such bills as appeared to be emergencies and of urgent necessity.

Mr. FINLEY. Now, just there, will the gentleman give me the urgent necessity in this instance?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Let me finish that statement. We particularly described as one of the emergencies which the committee thought ought to be taken care of, cases where authorizations had heretofore been made and where the department had attempted by advertisement to secure contracts for the erection of a building and found, after such effort, that the authorization was inadequate and that the building could not be constructed within the limits of the authorization; and that we would then consider propositions to increase the authorization. That is one of the cases. And for three times, as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] has stated, advertisements were made and efforts to make contracts were made, and it was found utterly impossible to construct an adequate building for the purposes of Grand Junction within the limits of the authorization.

Mr. FINLEY. Now, just there. I ask the gentleman what facilities are afforded at Grand Junction at this time for the accommodation of the public business?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I understand that they are extremely meager, though my friend from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] can answer the question.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will answer that. They have the post office in a rented building and without sufficient space. They have the Reclamation Service in another rented building in another part of the city and without sufficient space. They have the Forest Service in another place, and other Federal offices scattered around over the city.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman tell me what rentals are paid?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The report here of the Treasury Department shows that they pay $1,000 a year rent for the post office; they pay $750 a year for the Reclamation Service; they pay $300 a year for the Forest Service; and they pay $480 a year for the Weather Bureau, and besides that they have the Civil Service Commission and the Department of Justice in separate buildings. and they are establishing a drainage department of the Government that will require considerable room. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the post-office receipts of that city are $35,000 a year.

Mr. FINLEY. About how much population has Grand Junction?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There are 15,000 served at this office.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If my friend will permit me, I want to say this much further. He ought to recollect that the site for this building was procured some seven or eight years ago. The building was provided for in the public building bill of June 25, 1910, four and a half years ago. Now, the gentleman in his district, presumably, and I in mine and other gentlemen in theirs, had items carried in that bill. The buildings have been constructed. This is not a new proposition, but one which has been pending for all these years. It was carried originally in the bill of 1910, and on account of the fact of this foundation being so peculiar, as has been described, it has been utterly impossible to construct the building within the limits of the authorization. I hope my friend will not object.

Mr. FINLEY. I want to say to the gentleman this, that these are war times. The condition of the Treasury is not such as to warrant any expenditure that is not absolutely necessary, and I am not here contending for anything for any other State or any other district in the Union. But any proposition that looks to an isolated instance, where it is substantially a public building proposition as big as this, it strikes me it can wait until next winter.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say to the gentleman, and I am violating no confidence, I think, when I say that I had a talk with the President on the subject of this character of legislation recently, and I think the gentleman will agree with him that we ought not to stop all matters of public improvement; that where it is necessary for work to be done or where it results in a substantial saving to the Government and can not be done hereafter so well and so economically as it can be done now, it is our duty to do it now.

Mr. FINLEY. I do not understand how there could be so much of error in what would necessarily be the cost and the estimates upon which this proposition was first based.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me suggest to the gentleman that the Government functions have very greatly increased in that city since this building was originally proposed. The Reclamation Service has a large force there now. Grand Junction is the metropolis of western Colorado and the center of a large part of the Government functions in that part of our State, and these matters have been developing very much in recent years.

Mr. FINLEY. The figures which you have read amount to about $2,000 a year in rent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. More than that. They amount to nearly $3,000 a year in rent.

Mr. FINLEY. And then the necessary cost of upkeep of a public building would be vastly more. Now, I ask the gentleman how much harm and injury would be done to the public service by letting this matter go over until next winter?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina that this building has gone over now for 8 or 10 years, and it has been 4½ years since I got the original appropriation. If Congress is not going to pass any bills of this kind increasing any existing appropriations at all at this session. then I will acquiesce. However, I will say that there is no case more meritorious or urgent than this one, and if any bills of this kind are to be considered I certainly want to have this bill passed if possible.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will my friend permit one more question? He can realize——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I hope the gentleman will withhold that request for a moment. I just wanted to ask one question of my friend, if the gentleman will not insist on it now.

Mr. MANN. I withhold the request for the regular order for a minute.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say to the gentleman this, that here is a case where $100,000 has already been authorized. It is found that the building can not be constructed for that money. Is it not good business judgment to authorize $75.000 more now, when the gentleman knows that not a dollar of the $75.000 will possibly be reached for three years?

Mr. FINLEY. Has the site been obtained?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; seven or eight years ago. The Government owns the site now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

PUBLIC BUILDING, ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18783) to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building and site at St. Petersburg, Fla.

The bill was read, with a committee amendment.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] a question in regard to that.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve the right to object as well.

The SPEAKER. Very well.

Mr. MANN. If this increase is granted, will this be the last one that will be asked for?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I will say in reply to the gentleman that there is one other bill, which has passed the Senate——

Mr. MANN. I mean the last increase for this building?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, absolutely.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is sure of that?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MANN. We made two increases before, did we not?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; but I will say to the gentleman that this is one of the most marvelously growing places in America. There is no question about it.

Mr. MANN. We commenced by making an authorization of $55,000 in 1908, after we purchased a site for $7.500 in 1907. Would it not be wise, if this place is growing so rapidly, not to hurry the building, because everything we have done heretofore has fallen short?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; it would be wise to get this additional land as quickly as possible. That is the proposition here.

Mr. MANN. We provided $55,000 for a building in 1910, and increased it $25,000 in 1913. It is proposed now, in the early days of 1915, to make another increase. I do not say it is improper, but I just wondered if we could ever tie it up.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think so. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that this request does not come from my colleague [Mr. SPARKMAN], who represents St. Petersburg, but it comes from the Treasury Department.

Mr. MANN. I have never found him short in attending to his duties.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. He has not made the request. It comes absolutely from the department itself, and it was on their own initiative that the bill was introduced. Now I yield to my colleague [Mr. SPARKMAN].

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I only want to say that when the first authorization of this building was made I called the attention of the Treasury Department, possibly not that of the House, to the fact that the amount authorized was not sufficient for an adequate building there. That was in 1910. This they realized later. In the next act, in the bill of 1913, they provide for an increase of $25,000, which it contains. Again I warned that increase was not enough, and that they would yet need a further increase.

Last summer, when they were believed to begin work on the building, they found that the amount as increased would not suffice, and of their own initiative they sent an agent down there to look into the matter, who, after a thorough investigation, reported that they would need at least the amount which they ask for here, and which this bill carries.

Now as to the urgency of the matter, I doubt if there is one more so. Why, at this very time, and for several months past, the post-office authorities have been utilizing the municipal building—the city hall—of St. Petersburg as a post office, because they can not find any other suitable place for that purpose that is more available. Among other difficulties, the rents are higher there than the Post Office Department is willing to pay. Of course, no one will rent to the Government when he can get more from other parties, and but for the fact that the city itself lets them use a part of its own building, they would have no place there in that beautiful, progressive town in which to carry on the post-office business.

This bill, as has been stated by my colleague [Mr. CLARK], is very meritorious. There is certainly none on the entire calendar more so. The city is growing as rapidly as any other in Florida, and that means in the country. Its post-office receipts have grown from $13,661 in 1908 to $44,913 in 1914. Its normal population is now about 10,000, with a winter population of perhaps 25,000; and I would suggest that we had better provide for the building now and get it started, otherwise we may be soon called upon for a further increase.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, we have here, as has been stated, an appropriation for a building in the State of Florida. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Florida that, in view of the large amount of money that is collected from the different States by direct tax, Florida has already had its share.

Mr. SPARKMAN. As to that I want to say that Florida, up to this time, has not gotten anything. She has not asked for anything.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then I object. If the gentleman does not know what is going on down there and makes that statement, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] objects.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

REGULATION OF TRAFFIC DURING PARADES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2415) relating to the exclusion of traffic from the streets and avenues of the District of Columbia during parades.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that the House committee seems to have taken something for granted because this bill was prepared by the corporation counsel and because it already had been passed by the Senate. But I find on the first page, toward the end of line 7 and throughout line 8, when taken in connection with what follows, that the bill either gives concurrent jurisdiction to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and to the police court or it gives conflicting jurisdiction; I can not certainly tell which. Besides that, the bill nowhere creates the offense of misdemeanor or felony or any other specific offense. I therefore object to its present consideration, and further ask that the bill be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects, and asks that the bill be laid on the table. Is there objection to his request?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should have the bill laid on the table without its being considered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I call the attention of the gentleman to the title of this bill "relating to the exclusion of traffic from the streets and avenues of the District of Columbia during parades." It would seem to pertain to vehicular traffic and not to the granting of permits to parade. But the bill itself apparently empowers the commissioners to grant permits to parade, and then it imposes a fine of $40 for the violation of such regulation as they may provide. It is not clear to me, as I read the bill in connection with the title, whether the imposition of this penalty, which seems to be delegated to the commissioners, is to be against street car companies or vehicles that may interrupt a parade, or against those who parade without a permit.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I wish to say to the gentleman that in construing a statute the court will not take the title into consideration in connection with the bill; and if he will look at the end of line 7 and all of line 8, taken in connection with what follows, I apprehend that it may confer judicial power upon the commissioners to convict and impose fines.

Mr. MOORE. It reads that way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not think the commissioners ought to have judicial powers.

Mr. MOORE. I am not going to object to the motion to refer the bill back to the committee, but I think——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be stricken from the entire calendar and recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia?

There was no objection.

PETER LASSEN NATIONAL PARK, CAL.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 52) to establish the Peter Lassen National Park in the Sierra Nevada Mountains in the State of California, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington objects. The bill will be stricken from the calendar.

ALCATRAZ ISLAND.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9017) transferring the control and jurisdiction of Alcatraz Island, and its buildings thereon from the Department of War to the Department of Labor.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Alcatraz Island and all its buildings thereon, now under the control and jurisdiction of the Department of War, and now used as and known, designated as and called the United States military prison on Alcatraz Island, Cal., be, and the same hereby is, transferred to the Department of Labor to be used by the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, the said Alcatraz Island and all its buildings thereon to be hereafter under the exclusive control and jurisdiction of the Department of Labor

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That Alcatraz Island and all buildings, machinery, and improvements thereon, now under the control and jurisdiction of the Department of War, and used for and known as the Pacific branch, United States military prison, on Alcatraz Island, Cal., be, and the same hereby is, except as herein otherwise provided, transferred to the Department of Labor to be used by the Bureau of Immigration as an immigration station or for such other uses as may be provided for by law. The said Alcatraz Island, together with all buildings, machinery, and improvements thereon, shall be hereafter under the exclusive control and jurisdiction of the Department of Labor, subject to the provisions of the act of Congress approved September 28, 1850, providing for a lighthouse at Alcatraz Island."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to say that there does not appear to be any compensation to the War Department for the transfer of a very valuable piece of property.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, there is no compensation provided in this bill. After all, it would be simply a matter of bookkeeping—transferring in the Treasury Department from one page of the ledger to anther page of the ledger the cost of the buildings.

This transfer is really needed at the present time. Alcatraz Island, in the bay of San Francisco, is about 2 miles from the mainland, and has on it a comparatively new building, completed probably three or four years ago for a military prison.

The War Department has recently inaugurated a new policy with reference to military prisoners. As I understand it, the new regulation went into effect on or about September 30 last. Many of the prisoners confined in this military prison are deserters. They are serving time for desertion, ranging from one year to two or three years. Some of them, too, are serving time for felonies that were committed by them while they were in the Army. The War Department feels that when a soldier has deserted and is willing to serve out his time and get an honorable discharge, it should be the policy of the department to give that man a chance to redeem himself. I understand that the Navy Department has carried out such a policy for some years quite successfully. The War Department has now taken it up.

The purpose of the War Department is to rehabilitate an old fortification built in 1861, located at the northern extremity of the peninsula of San Francisco, known as Fort Point. This fort is a very substantial building. At a comparatively small cost of money it has been renovated and made habitable for disciplinary companies of soldiers who deserted and who are trying to redeem themselves. The War Department feels that these soldiers can be used to some advantage if they are placed in these disciplinary barracks at Fort Point; that their labor can be utilized in the construction of roads and walks, and the care of the grounds in the military posts in and about the bay of San Francisco.

The present immigration station is located on Angel Island, between 4 and 5 miles from San Francisco and approximately 3 miles north of Alcatraz Island. That station was completed about 10 years ago. With the exception of the building which contains the dynamos and boilers, as I now recall, the buildings are of wood construction. At the present time the sole occupants are orientals, Chinese and Japanese and Hindu immigrants who come from oriental countries to San Francisco.

There is no doubt that with the opening of the Panama Canal additional immigration buildings will have to be constructed. There are no accommodations, or there would be no accommodations at present, for white immigrants coming to San Francisco if they should come in any considerable numbers, and it is believed that they will come in considerable numbers as soon as the canal is formally opened for the traffic of the world. In view of that fact, the Secretary of Labor, negotiating with the War Department, and the War Department, feeling that a considerable saving could be made to the Government by transferring those buildings to the Department of Labor, has asked for this legislation.

Mr. MOORE. Has the Department of Labor indicated that it wants it?

Mr. KAHN. Yes. In the report of the Committee on Military Affairs on this bill the gentleman will find the statement that the Commissioner of Immigration and the Secretary of Labor both want the transfer.

Mr. MOORE. It would not want the buildings for prison purposes?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no. At a very small expense they could be converted into very desirable quarters for immigrants.

Mr. MOORE. Hospital purposes?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, there is a splendid hospital there. The buildings are of modern reinforced-concrete construction, only completed three or four years ago.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Would there not be another advantage that the gentleman overlooked in having this transfer, that instead of these disciplinary companies being located some 5 miles away, and being transferred back and forth every day at a loss of three or four hours' time, they might be conveniently employed if they were located at Fort Point?

Mr. KAHN. That is very true. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Is it not rather a reflection on the War Department that they should construct these modern buildings, almost finishing them now, and then immediately find out that they are not proper for the service for which they were constructed or that the place is not a proper one?

Mr. KAHN. The buildings themselves were constructed by prison labor, so that the actual cost of construction was not very great. But, as I stated at the very outset, the War Department has recently—in fact, within the last year—inaugurated an entirely new policy so far as the treatment of military prisoners is concerned. At the time the buildings were commenced no such policy was in contemplation. The fact that they have changed the former policy makes it advisable to transfer these buildings to another branch of the Government service that certainly will require buildings.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MOORE. Are these buildings known as prison buildings?

Mr. KAHN. They are known as the United States Military Prison, Branch of the Pacific.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman knows that it would be very unhappy to call buildings "prison buildings" that were to be devoted to immigration purposes.

Mr. KAHN. If they are turned over to the Department of Labor, they will be known as the United States Immigration Station. The very fact that these buildings occupy a very conspicuous location in the bay of San Francisco and are designated as a United States military prison, in my judgment, is exceedingly detrimental to the War Department.

Mr. NORTON. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that one of the principal reasons for desiring this change is the sentimental one that the citizens of San Francisco are opposed to having this prison located in the harbor on this island?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is entirely mistaken; the sentimental reason probably occurred to me rather than to anybody else. As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I do not think it a good thing to have such a conspicuous building as that pointed out as a military prison; but there is not a citizen of San Francisco who has expressed any opinion on the subject as far as I know. They are willing to have it there no matter what it is called, but the Immigration Service requires additional buildings and will have to have them, and in the interest of economy it is desirable to make this transfer.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, the report shows that within the past two years $250,000 has been expended in the construction of a new prison building on this island. It occurs to me that there is no immediate need for a change of the control of this building from the War Department to the Immigration Department, except that it be for the satisfaction of some citizens in San Francisco to improve the harbor and have these buildings designated as an immigration station rather than as a prison. Further than that, it means that a large appropriation will soon be asked for in the improving of the harbor and for the construction of other prison buildings on the mainland. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

THE NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have referred back to the Committee on Naval Affairs the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 20975) in order to correct one paragraph that does not accurately express the action of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. The unanimous action of the committee.

Mr. PADGETT. By inadvertence, the language does not accurately express the action of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MANN. I did not hear the request.

Mr. PADGETT. I am asking to have the naval appropriation bill, which is on the calendar, referred back to the Committee on Naval Affairs in order to correct some inaccurate language.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MALAMBO FIRE CLAIMANTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill S. 4254, an act to enable the Secretary of War to pay the amount awarded to the Malambo fire claimants by the joint commission under article 6 of the treaty of November 18, 1903, between the United States and Panama.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE FOREIGN SERVICE.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill S. 5614, for the improvement of the foreign service, which provides for the reorganization of the Consular Service and the secretaries in the Diplomatic Service.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter all appointments of secretaries in the Diplomatic Service and of consuls general and consuls shall be by commission to the offices of secretary of embassy or legation, consul general, or consul, and not by commission to any particular post, and that such officers shall be assigned to posts and transferred from one post to another by order of the President as the interests of the service may require: Provided, That no officer may be assigned for duty in the Department of State for a period of more than three years, unless the public interest demand further service, when such assignment may be extended for a period not to exceed one year, and no longer: Provided further, That no secretary, consul general, or consul shall be promoted to a higher class except upon the nomination of the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. That secretaries in the Diplomatic Service and consuls general and consuls shall hereafter be graded and classified as follows, with the salaries of each class herein affixed thereto:

SECRETARIES.

Secretary of class 1, $3,000.
Secretary of class 2, $2,625.
Secretary of class 3, $2,000.
Secretary of class 4, $1,500.
Secretary of class 5, $1,200.

CONSULS GENERAL.

Consul general of class 1, $12,000.
Consul general of class 2, $8,000.
Consul general of class 3, $6,000.
Consul general of class 4, $5,500.
Consul general of class 5, $4,500.

CONSULS.

Consul of class 1, $8,000.
Consul of class 2, $6,000.
Consul of class 3, $5,000.
Consul of class 4, $4,500.
Consul of class 5, $4,000.
Consul of class 6, $3,500.
Consul of class 7, $3,000.
Consul of class 8, $2,500.
Consul of class 9, $2,000.

SEC. 3. That section 1685 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1685. That for such time as any secretary of embassy or legation shall be lawfully authorized to act as chargé d'affaires ad interim at the post to which he shall have been appointed or assigned, he shall be entitled to receive, in addition to his salary as secretary of embassy or legation, compensation equal to the difference between such salary and 50 per cent of the salary provided by law for the ambassador or minister at such post; and for such time as any vice consul shall be lawfully authorized to assume charge of a consulate general or consulate during the absence of the principal officer at the post to which he shall have been appointed or assigned, he shall be entitled to receive, in addition to his regular salary or compensation as a subordinate consular officer or employee, compensation equal to the difference between such salary or compensation and 50 per cent of the salary provided by law for the principal consular officer at such post."

SEC. 4. That a secretary, consul general, or consul of whatever class detailed for special duty outside of the city of Washington shall be paid his actual and necessary expenses for subsistence during such special detail: Provided, That such special duty shall not continue for more than 60 days unless in the case of international gatherings, congresses, or conferences, when such subsistence expenses shall run only during the life of the international gathering, congress, or conference, as the case may be.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of State is directed to report from time to time to the President, along with his recommendations for promotion or for transfer between the department and the foreign service, the names of those secretaries in the Diplomatic Service and the names of those consular officers or departmental officers or employees who by reason of efficient service, an accurate record of which shall be kept in the Department of State, have demonstrated special efficiency, and also the names of persons found upon examination to have fitness for appointment to the lower grades of the service.

SEC. 6. That section 1674 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1674. That the official designations employed throughout this title shall be deemed to have the following meanings, respectively:

"First. 'Consul general' and 'consul' shall be deemed to denote full, principal, and permanent consular officers as distinguished from subordinates and substitutes.

"Second. 'Consular agent' shall be deemed to denote consular officers subordinate to such principals exercising the powers vested in them and performing the duties prescribed for them by regulation of the President at posts or places different from those at which such principals are located, respectively.

"Third. 'Vice consuls' shall be deemed to denote consular officers subordinate to such principals exercising and performing the duties within the limits of their consulates at the same or at different points and places from those at which the principals are located, except that when vice consuls take charge of consulates general or consulates when the principal officers shall be temporarily absent or relieved from duty they shall be deemed to denote consular officers who shall be substituted, temporarily, to fill the places of said consuls general or consuls.

"Fourth. 'Consular officer' shall be deemed to include consuls general, consuls, vice consuls, interpreters in consular offices, student interpreters, and consular agents, and none others.

"Fifth. 'Diplomatic officer' shall be deemed to include ambassadors, envoys extraordinary, ministers plenipotentiary, ministers resident, commissioners, chargés d'affaires, agents, secretaries of embassy and legation, and secretaries in the Diplomatic Service, and none others."

The offices of vice consul general, deputy consul general, and deputy consul are abolished.

SEC. 7. That no ambassador, minister, minister resident, diplomatic agent, or secretary in the Diplomatic Service of any grade or class shall, while he holds his office, be interested in or transact any business as a merchant, factor, broker, or other trader, or as an agent for any such person to, from, or within the country or countries to which he or the chief of his mission, as the case may be, is accredited, either in his own name or in the name or through the agency of any other person, nor shall he, in such country or countries, practice as a lawyer for compensation or be interested in the fees or compensation of any lawyer so practicing.

SEC. 8. That this act shall take effect on the 30th day of September, 1914, when all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are repealed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to state that if this bill is to be passed at this session it should be passed now, in order that it may be provided for in the appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman from Virginia state what the difference is between the Senate bill and the bill as reported from his committee. I notice that the Senate bill is quite different from the House bill.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The differences are slight.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. Is the gentleman's request for consideration, or is it a motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. His request is to take from the Speaker's table this bill and consider it.

Mr. MOORE. Does that admit of an opportunity for debate as under suspension of the rules? Under the suspension of the rules there would be 20 minutes on a side.

The SPEAKER. The suspension of the rules has nothing to do with it. The Chair put it ahead because if the bill is to be passed at all it should be passed now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman postpone the consideration of this bill until later in the afternoon, when we may have an opportunity to examine it? We have not been able to obtain the print that has been read by the Clerk.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the gentleman that 10 minutes have elapsed since I sent for my copy, and I have just been able to obtain it.

Mr. STAFFORD. And we are not certain of the copy we have received. The bill that I have in my hand does not show that it is the bill that passed the Senate.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. If I could be recognized a little later, I would be perfectly willing to postpone the consideration of the matter now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know about that. He can not tell what the state of the business will be in two or three hours. The Chair will promise to recognize the gentleman, however, as soon as we get through with the next two of these bills. Will that be satisfactory to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know how much time that will take, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is simply asking if the gentleman would like to have that much time.

Mr. STAFFORD. That certainly will be better than taking it up for consideration now.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Chair to make that the next three bills.

The SPEAKER. Very well; make it the next three.

MAJORS IN ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 17765) to regulate the details of majors in the Ordance Department.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That majors may be detailed in the Ordnance Department, under section 26 of the act approved February 2, 1901, and acts amendatory thereof, without a compulsory period of service out of that department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HONOLULU, HAWAII.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5295) to amend existing legislation providing for the acquisition of a site and the construction of a building thereon for the accommodation of the post office, United States courts, customhouse, and other governmental offices at Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the acts of June 30, 1906 (34 Stats., p. 782), June 30, 1906 (34 Stats., p. 794), May 30, 1908 (35 Stats., p. 490), May 30, 1908 (35 Stats., p. 541), March 4, 1909 (35 Stats., p. 951), June 25, 1910 (36 Stats., p. 696), March 4, 1911 (36 Stats., p. 1373),

March 4, 1913 (37 Stats., p. 866), and October 22, 1913, providing for the acquisition of a site, the enlargement thereof, and the construction of a building thereon for the accommodation of the post office, United States courts, customhouse, and other governmental offices at Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, in lieu of enlarging the site heretofore acquired for said building, to reconvey said site by the usual quitclaim deed to the person or persons from whom the United States acquired title, or to their successors in interest, upon the payment to the United States of the price the Government paid for said property, and conditioned upon the payment being first made by said previous owners, or by their successors in interest, of the sum of $35,000 to the person or persons who contributed said sum for the opening and dedication of Bishop Street, adjoining said site, or to their successors in interest; and the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a new and conveniently located site of ample area for said authorized building, and to enter into contract, within the limit of cost hereinafter fixed, for the acquisition of such new site, or such enlargement of the present site, and for the erection and completion of the building heretofore authorized: Provided, That the cost of the present site, including the enlargement thereof, or of such new site, and of said building shall not exceed the total of the limits of cost heretofore fixed, to wit, $1,325,000: Provided further, That all appropriations heretofore made toward the acquisition of the present site and the enlargement thereof and the construction of said building, together with the proceeds of such sale of the present site, are hereby made available toward the acquisition of such new site, or the enlargement of said present site, and the construction of said building upon either the new or the present site.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, lines 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, and line 1, on page 3, strike out the following: "Reconvey said site by the usual quitclaim deed to the person or persons from whom the United States acquired title, or to their successors in interest, upon the payment to the United States of the price the Government paid for said property, and conditioned upon the payment being first made by said previous owners, or by their successors in interest, of the sum of $35,000 to the person or persons who contributed said sum for the opening and dedication of Bishop Street, adjoining said site, or to their successors in interest," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Sell said site to the highest bidder, at public or private sale, after giving notice by advertisement for 30 days in some newspaper published in said city of Honolulu, at a minimum price of not less than $150,000, the proceeds of said sale to be paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

Page 3, lines 6 and 7, strike out the words "in his discretion."

Page 3, lines 11 and 12, after the word "site," strike out the comma and the words "or such enlargement of the present site."

Page 3, lines 13 and 14, strike out the words "the present site, including the enlargement thereof, or of."

Page 3, lines 19 and 20, strike out, after the word "building," the comma and the words "together with the proceeds of such sale of the present site."

Page 3, lines 21 and 22, after the word "site," strike out the comma and the words "or the enlargement of said present site."

Page 3, line 23, strike out the word "either" and the words "or the present."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice that there is no limitation in the bill as to the cost of the new site. We make available all of the moneys that have heretofore been appropriated for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Honolulu, without any limitation whatsoever on the cost of the new site. I propound this question to the gentleman who has charge of the bill—whether he does not think there should be some restriction placed in this bill on the exercise of discretion on the part of the Government officials in islands so far removed as Hawaii?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, this bill does not propose to take a cent out of the Treasury. The gentleman is aware of that, of course. In 1906 there was authorization for the construction of a customhouse, courthouse, post office, and various other public buildings in Hawaii, in Honolulu. A site was purchased for $104,000. It was ascertained that that was inadequate in size, and an appropriation or authorization was made for the purpose of enlarging it. It was found that was going to cost so much, and there were so many intricacies in regard to the matter, that it was determined they could not do that and still construct the building within the authorization. Therefore this bill is for the purpose of selling the old site at $150,000, turning that money into the Treasury, and then buying a new site and to construct the building out of the authorization; so it really is a net profit of $150,000 to the Public Treasury.

In regard to the suggestion of the gentleman, this is under the suggestion of the Treasury Department. It was first in the discretion as to enlargement of the old site, but all of that is stricken out, and that has been done with the concurrence of the Treasury Department. They say there are several sites in view. They believe they can buy a site and keep within the cost of $200,000 or $225,000. However, the entire site is to be purchased and the building constructed within the authorization, and hence we discussed with them the very question that the gentleman has asked, and they said for that reason they did not see any necessity and hoped there would not be any limit as to the cost of the site, because the building and the site can not exceed the amount of the authorization.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has had wide enough experience on the Committee on Public Buildings to know that if you are going to grant to these officials out there unlimited discretion as to the purchase of a site within the combined cost of the site and the public building, when the site has once been purchased, then they can come back and say that the site cost so much that they are not able to construct the building within the amount authorized.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, that is true; that is often done.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in the report to show what the estimated cost of the new building will be.

Mr. BURNETT. I see the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. KALANIANAOLE] here, who is perhaps more familiar with that proposition than I am, and I would not object to a reasonable limitation on the cost of the site. I believe it unnecessary, however, because this thing has been going on so long that they are very anxious to get on with the construction of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman will not contradict himself. In one breath he says he agrees with what I say might arise and the next breath he says he thinks it is unnecessary to do this.

Mr. BURNETT. I think so because of the facts. I think they will proceed to purchase the site and construct the building.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can not furnish the committee with any estimate as to the cost of the building?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Delegate here from Hawaii can give the gentleman more accurate information than I am able to give.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Mr. Chairman, the Treasury Department has not given any estimate of the cost of these sites. There are two sites now being considered by the Treasury Department, one in the city proper and another about a quarter of a mile out of the city, both of which I believe can be purchased for about $200,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Which one does the gentleman refer to when he says the price is $200,000?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Both the so-called Spreckels site and the Irwin site, I think, can be purchased for that amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. Both have an estimated value of $200,000?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. It may be a little more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman have any objection, in line 10, page 3, to inserting, after the word "cost," "$200,000," so as to read "within the limit of cost of $200,000," so that these officials in purchasing a new site will leave sufficient money for the erection of this public building?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. I do not think it would be well to limit the cost of the site to $200,000, as one can not say with any degree of certainty that that amount would be sufficient to purchase either of the sites under consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is acquainted with the practice in these public-building proposition of limiting the appropriation for the site and then the amount of appropriation for the public building. I have no objection whatsoever to the erection of this public building, but I can see that if a public building is to be erected there should be some limitation on the cost of the site.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. In this case I do not think it would be well to limit the cost of the site, inasmuch as the cost of the building and site must come within the authorization.

Mr. STAFFORD. I realize it is a proper legislative function to place a limitation as to the amount that can be paid for site purposes.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman knows that very frequently when there is no limitation on the cost of the site that they purchase a very large site at a very large price, and that then there is not enough money left to construct the building according to the original plans, and they come here for a supplemental appropriation. I would not have any objection, Mr. Speaker, even to raising the amount and allowing $50,000 more, so as not to restrict them too closely and enable them to obtain a proper site, but without such a limitation I will feel constrained to object. I hope that meets with the approval of the Delegate from Hawaii.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman objecting or objecting conditionally?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I am objecting conditionally, and I find my suggestion has the full approval, I may say, of the gentleman from Hawaii.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Do I understand the Delegate accepts the raise?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Delegate always accepts everything that is right and proper.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama what is the total authorization for site and building?

Mr. BURNETT. One million three hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. That has heretofore been made, but not in this bill.

Mr. GOULDEN. That excludes the sale or the proceeds of the sale of the present site?

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, yes; that goes back into the Treasury. Now, as far as the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin goes, I think it would be a very wise provision to put a limitation that the cost shall not exceed $250,000, and, like the Delegate, I do not believe it will cost that. I do not believe it will exceed $200,000, but out of abundant caution, in order that they may have ample funds, we have no objection.

Mr. MANN. You are selling the present site for $150,000.

Mr. BURNETT. And that goes into the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. That is not large enough, and what is the use of wasting time in passing a bill to buy a new site for $150,000?

Mr. STAFFORD. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The Delegate himself thinks it can be bought for $200,000, and so we give him plenty of leeway by adding $50,000. We put that limitation on the cost.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does that include the new proposition?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. In line 10, page 3, after the word "cost," strike out the words "hereinafter fixed" and insert in lieu thereof "of $250,000."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 10, after the word "cost," strike out the words "hereinafter fixed" and insert the word and figures "of $250,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

PRESIDIO AND FORT MASON (CAL.) LANDS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was H. J. Res. 346, ceding to the State of California temporary jurisdiction over certain lands in the Presidio of San Francisco and Fort Mason (Cal.) Military Reservation.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution has already become a law, a Senate bill of similar import having already been passed. I therefore move that it be stricken from the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

IMPROVEMENT OF FOREIGN SERVICE.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this is the point at which I understood I was to be recognized.

Mr. MANN. That bill went off the calendar. That does not count.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and consider at the present time the bill S. 5614, for the improvement of the foreign service. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the chairman of the committee should explain this bill.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin asked the difference between this bill and the bill as reported from the House committee. The gentleman, I suppose, has in his hand a print of the bill S. 5416?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. Since the colloquy I went out and obtained an engrossed copy of the Senate bill.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Now, the gentleman will observe at the end of line 14 of this bill as it passed the Senate——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Page 1, section 1, as follows:

Provided further, That no secretary, consul general, or consul shall be promoted to a higher class except upon the nomination of the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Of course, that absolutely destroyed the purpose of the bill.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; that was the purpose of the bill as recommended by the House committee. They did not use that language. The intention of this, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, is that the President may appoint to a class, and that being confirmed by the Senate he could transfer the secretary or the consul from any post in that class to any other post in the same class; but if the President wishes to promote or demote a consul or secretary it has to be sent to the Senate for confirmation. The House bill did not use that language but made a similar provision in different language.

Mr. MANN. The House bill was directly the contrary.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No.

Mr. MANN. The House bill provided consuls should be appointed as consuls and should be sent to posts in the discretion of the President.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Oh, no; it did not. Only to posts in the same class.

Mr. MANN. That is what it reads.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The House bill provided that consuls should be appointed to classes, and that confirmation had to be had by the Senate, and then if the President should desire he could transfer a consul from any post in that class to any other post in the same class, but he could not promote or demote the consul without the advice and consent of the Senate; and the provision applies to secretaries.

Mr. MANN. The House bill says:

That hereafter all appointments of secretaries in the Diplomatic Service and of consuls general and consuls shall be by commission to the offices of secretary of embassy or legation, consul general, or consul, and not by commission to any particular post, and that such officers shall be assigned to posts and transferred from one post to another by order of the President as the interests of the service may require.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Such officers shall be assigned to a post and transferred from one post to another.

Mr. MANN. Yes; they are to be appointed simply as consuls. It is true section 2 of the bill says the grade shall be classified as follows, but they are not appointed to a class. Under section 1 they are appointed as consuls. There is not any question about what the bill says. I supposed the very purpose of this bill was to give the President or the Secretary of State acting with him power to change consuls and let a man enter the service in a lower grade without being held up by Senators all the time on the question of patronage.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; the gentleman is mistaken as to the purpose of the bill, and the same question arose in the Senate that the gentleman is making now, that the bill was not clear on that point, and the amendment I have just called attention to was put in on the floor of the Senate to make that clear.

Mr. MANN. I may be mistaken as to the purpose of the bill, although I have examined this bill for several Congresses.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That was not the purpose. And the Senate took the position that the gentleman from Illinois takes, that the wording of the bill was not plain, and did not carry out the meaning of the bill, and therefore added that amendment.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman has introduced two bills on this same subject in the House, has he not?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. And when he refers to the House bill, to which one does he refer?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I refer to H. R. 18654.

Mr. MAPES. In H. R. 18654, sections 5, 6, and 7 of H. R. 16680 were omitted, were they not?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. And that strikes out the section providing for the efficiency reports and the competitive examination feature, does it not?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Now, in the Senate bill as it passed the Senate, section 5 was kept in?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. The bill passed the Senate with that section in?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman propose, if unanimous consent is given to consider this bill this afternoon, to offer an amendment striking out section 5 as reported by the House committee, or to leave it in as it passed the Senate?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. In deference to the gentleman, I did not propose to offer an amendment to the Senate bill. I do not care about section 5, but I do not propose to offer any amendment to strike it out.

Mr. STAFFORD. To which section 5 does the gentleman refer?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Section 5 in the bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. The engrossed copy? What objection could there be to that? It reads as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of State is directed to report from time to time to the President, along with his recommendations for promotion or for transfer between the department and the foreign service, the names of those secretaries in the Diplomatic Service and the names of those consular officers or departmental officers or employees who by reason of efficient service, an accurate record of which shall be kept in the Department of State, have demonstrated special efficiency, and also the names of persons found upon examination to have fitness for appointment to the lower grades of the service.

Is that the section that the gentleman objects to?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do not object to it. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] wants it.

Mr. MAPES. I object to its being taken out.

Mr. STAFFORD. What objection could be lodged against it?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. My only objection to that is that it was a part of the system of civil service that was originally incorporated in this bill.

Mr. ROGERS. I have in my hand a copy of Senate bill 5614, which was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations to the Senate. I attempted to get from the House and Senate document rooms the text of that bill as it passed the Senate, but they tell me it has not been printed. I presume the copy that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has in his hand is the only copy in this room.

Mr. MANN. No. I will loan the gentleman my copy if he desires it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That was the only change made. The bill passed the Senate exactly as reported by the committee, with the exception that I have indicated.

Mr. MOORE. Has section 5 of the bill S. 5614 been stricken out by the Senate?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] asked me if I would move to strike it out if unanimous consent were given to the consideration of the bill. I said I would not.

Mr. MOORE. Section 5 of the Senate bill will be considered when the time comes for consideration?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. I wish to inquire if sections 6 and 7, both pertaining to examinations and promotions, were in the bill as originally presented to the House by the gentleman from Virginia himself.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. As originally introduced. I subsequently changed it and introduced another bill.

Mr. MOORE. And they were stricken out by the Senate, and they contain certain civil-service features?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They not only were stricken out by the Senate, but the House committee did not report them.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman say why they were stricken out by the House and by the Senate?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They were stricken out by the House committee because that committee was anxious for the early enactment of this legislation, and we thought the bill would stand a better chance to get through if we did not inject the civil-service feature into the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield a moment? I want to read what Mr. Carr said with respect to the civil-service feature.

Mr. MAPES. Just one moment. Was the Foreign Relations Committee in the Senate in favor of the two sections?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. There were several gentlemen who were in favor of them. I am not, and I do not know how many gentlemen there are on the House committee who are not in favor of them.

Mr. MAPES. They were in the bill as originally introduced?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; they were in the bill as originally introduced; and I then introduced another bill leaving them out and leaving out section 5 of the Senate bill. But I will say to the gentleman that, so far as the civil-service law is concerned, there is an Executive order in the State Department that puts consuls and secretaries to embassies and legations under as strict civil-service regulation as any law we could pass, and it is being rigidly enforced at the present time.

Mr. MAPES. The Executive order could be changed at any time?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Could I make a suggestion to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the gentleman from Virginia expected to suspend the rules and have this bill considered to-day, which would require a two-thirds vote?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Now the gentleman is asking unanimous consent. If consent is given now there will be an opportunity, I take it, for amendment and debate? The gentleman would not expect to move the previous question at once?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is perfectly willing to allow a reasonable allotment of debate and amendment under the five-minute rule?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me we would make progress if we were to determine now whether or not we were going to consider it where we would have a chance to amend it, over what we would make if we considered it only under suspension of the rules.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, if I am allowed to introduce an amendment to reincorporate into the bill sections 6 and 7, I shall have no objection. I understand that I will have that right.

Mr. MOORE. I want a ittle time, but I do not want to interfere with the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] intends to object conditionally?

Mr. MAPES. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a Union Calendar bill.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. With the understanding that there will be reasonable latitude for debate and amendment?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter all appointments of secretaries in the Diplomatic Service and of consuls general and consuls shall be by commission to the offices of secretary of embassy or legation, consul general, or consul, and not by commission to any particular post, and that such officers shall be assigned to posts and transferred from one post to another by order of the President as the interests of the service may require: Provided, That no officer may be assigned for duty in the Department of State for a period of more than three years, unless the public interest demand further service, when such assignment may be extended for a period not to exceed one year, and no longer: Provided further, That no secretary, consul general, or consul shall be promoted to a higher class except upon the nomination of the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). The gentlemen from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, this bill purports to be for "the improvement of the foreign service." I am certainly in favor of the improvement of the foreign service so far as it pertains to the efficiency of the personnel, and I join very heartily in the recommendation of the Secretary of State that there shall be some improvement in the salaries paid to many of our hard-working and efficient representatives on the other side of the water. Too much can not be said about the work they are doing, and too much can not be said about the advisability of encouraging these men to give even better service. Many of them receive a stipend that is niggardly in the extreme; consuls, vice consuls, and others of the minor representatives in the foreign service. It is regrettable that some of our American representatives in foreign countries must live and maintain families on salaries ranging from $1,500 and less up. I would like to see all that corrected in some systematic way, but I would not like to see taken away from the men who are faithful and who work at such small compensations the right of promotion and the hope and expectation of being advanced in consequence of faithful service performed. If the bill did not leave a loophole in this respect, admitting of the possible overthrow of an efficient service by omitting the right of examination and promotion upon records made, I would cheerfully support it.

The Secretary of State, in his report recommending the passage of the bill, argues for "a higher efficiency" to the Government and "greater service to the business interests" than are obtainable at present. The Secretary of State makes this specific statement in his report to the United States Senator who happened to have charge of the bill in the other Chamber.

The Secretary of State, however, in his official letter suggests the advisability of introducing "elasticity into the service." First he wants "a higher efficiency," then he wants the privilege to "introduce elasticity into the service."

Now, if it were simply a matter of meeting a war condition, if it meant only that in an emergency he should have the right to transfer these consular officers, without sending their names to the Senate for confirmation, very well. That kind of "elasticity" might be all right. This House might very readily approve of it. But the Secretary has laid himself open to a double meaning upon this question of "elasticity" and of efficiency in the service.

At a recent court proceeding in New York City we were given a side light upon the kind of "elasticity" that might be generally applied to secure the kind of "efficiency" most desired by the Secretary of State.

Addressing the Hon. W. Walter Vick about consular matters in Santo Domingo the Secretary said:

MY DEAR MR. VICK: Now that you have arrived—

Mr. Vick, you will remember, was appointed to a position approaching that of diplomacy for this particular island.

MY DEAR MR. VICK: Now that you have arrived and are acquainting yourself with the situation, can you let me know what positions you have at your disposal with which to reward deserving Democrats? Whenever you desire a suggestion from me in regard to a man for any place there, call on me.

Are we to understand by this that the Secretary is standing in this particular for "higher efficiency" or for an "elasticity" of the service that will give him the privilege of sending those friends of his whom he regards as deserving Democrats to fill positions in the service?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). The gentleman has spoken five minutes.

Mr. MOORE. I ask unanimous consent to continue the reading of this letter until it is finished.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. The Secretary, in his letter to Mr. Vick, continues:

You have had enough experience in politics to know how valuable workers are when a campaign is on and how difficult it is to find suitable rewards for all the deserving. I do not know to what extent a knowledge of Spanish is necessary for employees. Let me know what is required, together with the salary, and when appointments are likely to be made.

Sullivan will be down before long, and you and he together ought to be able to bring about such reforms as may be necessary there. You will find Sullivan a strong, courageous, reliable fellow. The more I have seen of him the better satisfied I am that he will fit into the place there and do what is necessary to be done.

W. J. BRYAN.

I have no further comment to make, Mr. Speaker, except to say that the Secretary of State who wrote this letter to Mr. Vick seeking places for "deserving Democrats" in the Consular Service is the same Secretary who, in his report to the Senator who had this bill passed in the Senate, said:

In the present emergency—

That is, the emergency for the passage of this bill giving the Secretary an "elasticity" in the service—

the President desires me to inform you that he earnestly hopes that the bill S. 5614, which you were good enough to introduce in the House on May 19 last, will become a law at the earliest possible moment.

And in this connection I would add that the President, whose wish was voiced by the Secretary of State in his letter to the Senator, is the same President who only recently, in a speech at Indianapolis, indicated that he stood for a particular political party, and that he desired to see the interests of that particular party advanced.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this may be a good bill in that it provides higher salaries for some of our deserving consular employees. It may be a good bill in that it may encourage "higher efficiency" without examinations; but if it is such a bill as will grant to the Secretary of State that "elasticity" which he seems to desire in his letter to Mr. Vick, then it is a bad bill, and ought not to pass.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment:

Strike out the proviso in section 1, which reads as follows:

"Provided, That no officer may be assigned for duty in the Department of State for a period of more than three years, unless the public interests demand further service, when such assignment may be extended for a period not to exceed one year, and no longer."

And insert in place thereof the following:

"Provided, That any such officer may be assigned for duty in the Department of State without loss of grade, class, or salary, such assignment to be for a period of not more than three years, unless the public interests demand further service, when such assignment may be extended for a period not to exceed one year, and no longer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. I have not reduced the amendment to writing. I think when I explain the amendment——

Mr. MANN. I know; but the gentleman can not offer his amendment in this way. We have a right to know what the amendment is. The gentleman has plenty of opportunity to prepare his amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the proviso in section 1, which reads as follows:

"Provided, That no officer may be assigned for duty in the Department of State for a period of more than three years, unless the public interests demand further service, when such assignment may be extended for a period not to exceed one year, and no longer."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That any such officer may be assigned for duty in the Department of State without loss of grade, class, or salary, such assignment to be for a period of not more than three years, unless the public interest demands further service, when such assignment may be extended for a period not to exceed one year, and no longer."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, this measure was originally introduced in the House by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] on May 19, 1914, and into the Senate by Senator STONE on May 20. It was, I think, identical as originally introduced in the two branches. It was taken up and hearings were had upon it in the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. In the House committee is was suggested that there was weakness in the proviso to section 1 as originally drawn, for this reason: It has been the habit of the Department of State to withdraw secretaries of embassies or legations from their service in foreign posts and place them temporarily as clerks in the Department of State. As there has hitherto been no appropriation under which the department was enabled to pay to such secretaries their previous salaries, they were allowed only the compensation ordinarily paid the regular clerks in the personnel of the department. Therefore these men, not because they were inefficient, not because they were being punished, but simply because there was no appropriation that could care for them, were, when thus taken back into the Department of State, often to do the most responsible service, obliged to serve at perhaps two-thirds or one-half of their regular pay.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs in considering this measure felt that this result was improper and unjust, and drafted an amendment to care for it, and in reporting the bill to the House that amendment was embodied. It reads as follows:

That any such officer may be assigned for duty to the Department of State without loss of grade, class, or salary—

And so forth.

That was clearly to cover this very point. It was suggested by some officials of the department that possibly the measure as originally drawn cared for the difficulty, but it was the opinion of the committee that it did not and that it was safer to have such a provision. Therefore, as it is not included in the Senate bill now before us, I am suggesting it in the form of an amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the idea contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and yet I hope it will not be adopted at this time, because I believe that any amendment to this bill now may mean its defeat.

The gentleman has the same desire that the department has and that the members of the Senate committee have. Everybody who has investigated the matter realizes that to bring a secretary from an embassy paying $3,000 a year to Washington to do work for the Department of State at a salary of $1.000 or $1,200 or $1,500 is unjust and unfair, and in drawing this bill, which is a State Department bill, it was drawn to obviate that injustice. In the opinion of the officials of the State Department it does obviate that injustice, and I think there can be no doubt about it, though the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts is clearer.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that where a man is appointed to the Consular Service and his salary is fixed by law, and the same act provides that he may be assigned to the State Department temporarily, that he will receive the salary fixed by law when he is so assigned unless it is expressly set forth in the law to the contrary?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Not under the present law.

Mr. McKENZIE. I mean under this bill.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; under this bill he will, because after this act has been approved it provides for more secretaries in certain classes than there are posts for those secretaries to fill. There will be one additional secretary in the $3.000 class, and that secretary will be assigned to duty here in Washington, and he will get the $3,000 when he is appointed a secretary in that class, whether he is secretary at London or Paris or here in Washington. He will be appointed secretary in class 1, and will be confirmed as a secretary in class 1, and when he is brought to Washington he will still be a secretary in class 1, and although performing duties in the department at Washington he will draw the salary of a secretary in class 1.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman recognizes that the present system is unjust and indefensible?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ROGERS. I assume that the present law would continue in operation in this city unless it was changed by the new law. Can the gentleman point to anything in the new law that changes it?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; all secretaries are appointed to classes, and the salaries for those classes are fixed in the bill, and when they are assigned to London or Paris they will be assigned to class 1 and get $3,000. If assigned to the Department of State in Washington, they will still get the $3,000.

Mr. ROGERS. The only language of the bill is this language:

Provided, That no officer may be assigned for duty in the Department of State for a period of more than three years unless the public interests demand further service.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They will assign him from one of these classes—either 1, 2, 3, or 4—to duty in the department at Washington. A man so assigned will stay three years, except for special reasons for extending it, and then he gets a salary not as clerk but as secretary in his class, assigned for duty in the Department of State at Washington. That is the construction put upon it by the State Department and also by the Senate. While it is not as clear as the language in the gentleman's amendment, it seems to me that it is clear enough. I will say that if the gentleman wants to improve the service, if he wants this bill to pass, his amendment ought not to be agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. I have no desire to imperil the bill, because I thoroughly believe in it. But this bill will go to conference, and it seems to me there will be ample time to consider it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It might be very difficult to get it up in the Senate again.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it not true that if it comes back from conference and goes to the committee it loses its privilege?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that the Secretary of State is in favor of this bill not only because it increases the salary for a few secretaries, but because it makes the service more elastic, and that elasticity is not in the way of enabling the Secretary of State to provide positions for Democrats over Republicans, but it is to transfer secretaries from one post in some class to another. As to the letter which was read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that the Secretary of State wrote to Mr. Vick it meets my hearty approval, and I believe it meets the approval of red-blooded party men in this country, Democrats or Republicans. It was simply a statement that in his opinion there were Democrats as able to fill positions as Republicans, and so far as he was concerned he favored a Democrat of capacity and character over a Republican, and I believe his wisdom and patriotism in that matter is approved by the country. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am very much surprised to hear the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] or anyone else openly defend the unfortunate letter of Secretary Bryan to Mr. Vick. That was not a case of getting Democrats jobs as against Republicans. It was a case of trying to exploit the people of another country in order to furnish ward workers for the Democratic Party in this country. It was a case of trying to make the poor people of Santo Domingo pay the expenses—I will not say of the Democratic Party, but of the political heelers of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to reorganize to a large extent the Consular Service of our Government, as well as other portions of the Diplomatic Service. Personally I am in favor of the bill. I hope that we may accomplish by legislation some kind of an organization that in some way, unknown to us, will perhaps put a little lime or other element of strength into the backbone of the State Department. I received yesterday by wireless the following telegram from one of the newspaper correspondents who has been in Washington for some time, now, I believe, on his way to Berlin to act as a newspaper correspondent there. It may be assumed that he is pro-German. I suspect that to be the case. He says:

S. S. "NEW AMSTERDAM," January 16.

Representative MANN,
Washington, D. C.:

New Amsterdam held up by British cruiser Caronia in sight of New York. American citizens, including correspondent of Washington Herald, forced to show passports to British officer. See Fish-Berthemy letter.

SCHUETTE.

I remember the letter which Secretary Fish wrote during the Franco-Prussian War in 1870. At that time French war vessels hovered around the city of New York and the entrance to Norfolk Harbor prepared to seize German vessels that might come out; and as there was some backbone and nerve in the office of the State Department at that time, Secretary Hamilton Fish wrote a letter which, I think, was addressed to Elihu B. Washburne, the American minister to France. It was to our diplomatic representatives in France at that time. The letter is as follows:

SECRETARY OF STATE HAMILTON FISH TO E. B. WASHBURNE, AMERICAN MINISTER TO FRANCE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 4, 1870.

This Government desires and intends to maintain a perfect and strict neutrality between the two powers now unfortunately engaged in war. It desires also to extend to both the manifestation of its friendly feeling in every possible way and will allow to the vessels of war of each power equally the hospitality of its ports and harbors for all proper and friendly purposes.

But this hospitality is liable to abuse, and circumstances have arisen to give rise in the minds of some persons to the apprehension that attempts at such abuse have taken place.

I am not in possession of facts to justify me in saying that such has been the case, but I have deemed myself justified in calling the attention of M. Berthemy, the French representative at this Capital, to the current rumors, sustained, as they are, by the presence of a number of French vessels upon the coast of the United States. These vessels have appeared at or near the entrance of the harbor of New York, off Sandy Hook; at the entrance of the Long Island Sound; at or near the entrance of the Chesapeake Bay. One or more is represented to have been anchored not far from Sandy Hook (the main entrance to New York Harbor), and there is a difference of statement as to the precise distance at which she lay from the shore, some claiming that she was within a marine league. But of this there is no positive evidence. She has entered the port of New York—as claimed by some—for the purpose of watching a German steamer about to sail thence. Three of them have put into the harbor of New London (which looks out upon Long Island Sound, the eastern entrance to the New York Harbor) avowedly for some small repairs; one recently asked permission, which was granted, to make some repairs at the Norfolk Navy Yard, near the entrance of Chesapeake Bay.

All this may be consistent with an intention of perfect observance of the neutral character of our waters and jurisdiction and with an entire absence of undertaking any hostile movement against the vessels of North Germany from those waters or that jurisdiction.

A large trade has been carried on from the ports of the United States approached by the waters in which these vessels have thus appeared by vessels belonging to North Germany.

The appearance of French vessels in these immediate neighborhoods in such numbers and force does not fail to excite the alarm of these vessels and must have the effect to a greater or less degree to diminish that trade.

The United States are not prepared at present to say that any actual violation of international law has been committed or that the hospitality of these waters has been positively abused. But the hovering of the vessels of war of a belligerent on the coasts near the entrance of the principal ports of a friendly power does interfere with the trade of the friendly power.

The interruption of the regular communication with you, by reason of the investment of Paris, has led me to represent to M. Berthemy our views on this subject and to say that, although the vessels of either belligerent may not actually shelter within the jurisdiction of the United States and proceed thence against the vessels of its enemy, this Government would regard as an unfriendly act the hovering of such vessels upon the coast of the United States, near to its shores, in the neighborhood of its ports, and in the track of the ordinary commerce of these ports with intent to intercept the vessels of trade of its enemy.

I have requested M. Berthemy to make known these views to the French Government and to express the confident hope of the President that there may be no cause of complaint on the part of this Government by reason of any such hovering by the vessels of the French Government.

You will be pleased to take an early opportunity to present the same view to the minister for foreign affairs, which you may do by reading to him this dispatch.

HAMILTON FISH.

Mr. Berthemy at that time was the French representative at this Capital. How refreshing it is to go back to the old days of Ulysses S. Grant and Hamilton Fish and learn that we had the nerve to tell the French to keep their war vessels away from the entrance to our harbors with intent to annoy the commerce of this country, and they kept them away. [Applause.] And if we would say so now, Great Britain would keep hers away. We are a neutral power; but we have some rights, and we ought to insist upon our rights being respected. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the American people agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in his statement that there is no backbone in the administration of the present State Department. I believe that the American people applaud and approve the actions and policies of the present Secretary of State, as well as the whole administration. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] just read a letter into the RECORD and criticized the Secretary of State for writing to Mr. Vick about getting places for certain Democrats. The gentlemen on that side of the aisle forget that when the Democrats came into control of the Sixty-second Congress, and when the Republicans in Washington and away from Washington saw the handwriting upon the wall, the Republican administration under Mr. Taft and the State Department, presided over by Secretary Knox, recommended to the Foreign Affairs Committee of this House that we enact into law the placing of the Consular Service under the civil service. This was not done until they saw that the Democrats would sweep the country in 1912 We did not take their suggestions, because we knew and they knew they had placed Republicans in all of the places in this service and had covered them in by an Executive order, and we knew they wanted them fixed so that they could be retained. The administration has not removed them. They have kept them. The administration has placed efficiency above partisanship. I do not know that I can agree absolutely with that policy. I believe that good and efficient Democrats could have been found to take and fill many of these places. This bill is based on efficiency and economy. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] says that he is going to introduce some amendments to put these places under the civil service. If he will read section 5 he will see that these places are to be filled on merit.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. I understand the gentleman's contention to be that the President has authority under the orders heretofore issued by President Roosevelt and President Taft to conduct something of the same kind of an examination as is provided in the amendment which I propose to introduce.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and there is an Executive order now in force.

Mr. MAPES. That can be set aside by the stroke of the pen of the President.

Mr. HARRISON. It can; and I want to say that the representative of the State Department, Mr. Carr, came before the committee and said that this was what they desired to have done.

Mr. MAPES. May I ask the gentleman a further question? Is the gentleman in favor of carrying out in good faith those orders of the former Presidents?

Mr. HARRISON. I am in favor of appointing efficient men to this service, and I hope and believe that they can find Democrats to fill these places who are efficient. I believe, like the Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, that Democrats are just as good as Republicans, and I do not believe there is a Republican on that side of the aisle who has any respect for his party and any feelings for the men who make up the rank and file of the party who is not in favor when they get into power of putting good Republicans in control if they can get them. I think possibly you could find a few if you should get a comb and scrape the whole country and——

Mr. MAPES. I am afraid the gentleman is not answering my question.

Mr. HARRISON. What was the gentleman's question?

Mr. MAPES. Is the gentleman in favor of carrying out in good faith those orders of the former Presidents?

Mr. HARRISON. If it were left to me, I would abolish the Executive order with respect to this business altogether and put in good Democrats throughout the country who are reliable and worthy and efficient.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Then the gentleman's objection to the amendment I propose to introduce is based upon the fact that he is not in sympathy with those orders and therefore not willing to have them enacted into law?

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the gentleman that Mr. Carr, representing the department, came before us, and Mr. LINTHICUM, a member of the committee, asked him this question:

> Mr. LINTHICUM. And the civil service of this bill you recommend striking out?
> Mr. CARR. We recommend leaving that just where it stands at present under existing Executive orders.

And another reason why I am opposed to the amendment would be that it might be impossible, if you tack on amendments to this bill, to get it enacted into law at this session of Congress. The Senate would not probably recede from their former action and concur in them, and it might be the means of defeating this most desirable legislation.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. This bill was started six months ago with those sections all in it?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. At that time it would have been just as easy to report it out of the committee and pass it with those provisions in as without them?

Mr. HARRISON. It was not reported out of the House committee with those provisions in it. A majority of the committee were opposed to incorporating them in the bill.

Mr. MAPES. It was before the committee with those provisions in.

Mr. HARRISON. It was; and they were stricken out on the recommendation of the State Department. I think probably the State Department thought it might endanger the passage of the bill. Mr. Speaker, one word in conclusion, and that is that I hope that no amendment will be tacked on this bill, so that the bill can be speedily passed and become a law. It is very important that that should be done.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Carr, director of consuls, indorses this bill and recommends its passage?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, undoubtedly he favors it and recommends its passage as well as the State Department recommends it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 3. That section 1685 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to read as follows:
> "SEC. 1685. That for such time as any secretary of embassy or legation shall be lawfully authorized to act as chargé d'affaires ad interim at the post to which he shall have been appointed or assigned, he shall be entitled to receive, in addition to his salary as secretary of embassy or legation, compensation equal to the difference between such salary and 50 per cent of the salary provided by law for the ambassador or minister at such post; and for such time as any vice consul shall be lawfully authorized to assume charge of a consulate general or consulate during the absence of the principal officer at the post to which he shall have been appointed or assigned he shall be entitled to receive, in addition to his regular salary or compensation as a subordinate consular officer or employee, compensation equal to the difference between such salary or compensation and 50 per cent of the salary provided by law for the principal consular officer at such post."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I rise to inquire of the chairman whether this increase of salary to the acting secretaries and consuls and vice consuls is to be paid, whether there is a vacancy or not, or whether it is to be paid in every instance——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. What section?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am referring to the provision in section 3—that any secretary of embassy or legation or vice consul who fills the post during the absence of his principal shall receive, in addition to his regular salary, compensation equal to the difference between such salary and 50 per cent of the salary provided by law for the principal at such post.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. What is the question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Whether he is to be paid only in the case the salary of the principal is not being drawn, or whether he is to be paid under all conditions, whether the principal is absent from his post and drawing the salary or not?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; he is only paid where the principal is absent and not drawing his salary.

Mr. STAFFORD. The section does not place any such limitation upon it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is a rule in the State Department. If the principal gets leave of absence, he does not draw the salary; and, as a matter of fact, this provision saves the Government money.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question as to the saving of money to the Government, if the principal is not to receive the salary while absent from his post.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is the fact.

Mr. MANN. That is the case now.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in this section—that may be a regulation, but it is not provided in the section.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is the construction that has been put upon the law from time immemorial.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the other practice could pertain under the wording of this amendment.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. But it does not in practice.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not the intent?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No, indeed.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 4. That a secretary, consul general, or consul of whatever class detailed for special duty outside of the city of Washington shall be paid his actual and necessary expenses for subsistence during such special detail: Provided, That such special duty shall not continue for more than 60 days unless in the case of international gatherings, congresses, or conferences, when such subsistence expenses shall run only during the life of the international gathering, congress, or conference, as the case may be.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend section 4 by inserting just before the proviso—I do not have the page and line—after the word "detail," the following: "Not exceeding $4 per day."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 1, after the word "detail," insert the words "not exceeding $4 per day," so that the line will read "expenses for subsistence during such special detail not exceeding $4 per day."

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. I will yield.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that the sum stated in his amendment, $4 per day, is ample to cover the expenses for subsistence in other countries? I believe from what knowledge I may have of the matter that there are certain capitals in Europe where the expense for subsistence would be considerably greater than $4 per day.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt there are many places where it could be greater than $4 per day. We passed a law here in the last session, I believe it was, limiting the amount that could be paid for subsistence here to $4 or $5 a day——

Mr. STAFFORD. Five dollars.

Mr. MANN. To anybody, a Cabinet officer or anybody else. I do not pretend to be fixed about the amount. Maybe it ought to be $5 a day, although it occurred to me that $4 was all right. This is simply where a man is detailed to some place else, and we still pay him his salary. This pays him his subsistence. Now, it became a habit under the law authorizing these payments generally to pay the judges of the court of the United States $10 a day. That is what they get. They put in a bill for $10 a day whenever they are holding court in places away from where they live. I do not think we ought to extend that abuse to anybody else.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. If the gentleman will yield, it seems to me if the State Department orders some of these subordinate officials of the Government in the Diplomatic Service to leave their posts and go to other cities on special duty and be put to the additional expense of providing for their subsistence, that they might find themselves put to very great inconvenience and hardship if limited to the sum named by the gentleman from Illinois, namely, $4 a day. It seems to me it should be much larger in Europe and other countries than in the United States.

Mr. MANN. The expense of living in Europe is not as large as living in the United States, and it should be remembered that these people are drawing their salaries, anyhow. If they want to live high, I have no objection.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. This is not intended to cover a detail in Europe. It is only intended to cover a detail in this country, and I think the gentleman from Illinois is correct about it. There ought to be a limitation, and still I believe it will imperil the passage of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it will not.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. If the gentleman will make it $5 a day instead of $4, it would be more satisfactory.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing to say $5 a day.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Make it $5 a day.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make the amount not exceeding $5 per day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois modifies his amendment by making it to read not to exceed $5 a day.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. FOSTER. That makes it not exceeding $5 a day in this country?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the reason we should pay more than we do for subsistence to other men in the service? It means if this amendment is adopted they will likely get $5 a day instead of $4.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. These men are in the Consular Service or are secretaries of embassies and legations, who are brought here and sent about the country to confer with commercial boards and to give them information about matters in foreign countries.

Mr. MANN. This provides for actual expenses.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand, they have actual expenses besides this $4 a day?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No. That is not the intention of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Their actual expenses for subsistence will not exceed so much.

Mr. FOSTER. Actual expenses for subsistence; but that does not include the railroad fare.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; that has nothing to do with railroad fare. They get paid that, and properly.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I was getting at. This gives them $5 a day besides their traveling expenses?

Mr. MANN. It does if they spend it.

Mr. FOSTER. I judge they would usually spend that amount.

Mr. MANN. Ordinarily they would in Chicago, New York, or Washington, undoubtedly.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of State is directed to report from time to time to the President, along with his recommendations for promotion or for transfer between the department and the foreign service, the names of those secretaries in the Diplomatic Service and the names of those consular officers or departmental officers or employees who by reason of efficient service, an accurate record of which shall be kept in the Department of State, have demonstrated special efficiency, and also the names of persons found upon examination to have fitness for appointment to the lower grades of the service.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment. I have not the engrossed copy of the bill, and it may be that the amendment comes after a different line than the one I have marked.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4 of the engrossed copy, after line 17, insert the following as a new section:

"SEC. 6. That the board of examiners for the Diplomatic Service shall be composed of an Assistant Secretary of State, the chief examiner of the Civil Service Commission or such other officer as that commission shall designate, a law officer of the Department of State, and one other officer to be designated by the Secretary of State. The board of examiners for the Consular Service shall be composed of an Assistant Secretary of State, the Director of the Consular Service, a law officer of the Department of State, the Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce, and the chief examiner of the Civil Service Commission or such other officer as that commission shall designate.

"SEC. 7. That the scope and method of the examinations shall be determined by the board of examiners, but the examinations shall include business experience and ability; the resources and commerce of the United States, with special reference to the development of export trade; international, commercial, and maritime law; American history, government, and institutions; and one language other than English. These examinations shall be held at least once annually, and shall be conducted with strict impartiality and without regard to the political or other affiliations of any candidate; and upon their conclusion the board of examiners shall certify in writing to the Secretary of State the names of those persons whom they have found to be, in their judgment, thoroughly well qualified for the Diplomatic or Consular Services, and the results of the examinations shall be made public.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I reserve it now. The amendment provides for a board of examiners and a complete civil-service system in the Consular and Diplomatic Service. This is a bill to appoint consuls and secretaries to classes. The amendment is a civil-service law incorporated into this bill and is not germane to anything that is in the bill. I think it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. Why, Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the appointment of consular officers. It provides for dividing them into grades, and it provides for their salary. Now, if we provide for the appointment, we can lead up to the appointment. Personally I do not have any doubt that the amendment is germane, but as laid before the House I can not vote for it, because I do not want to destroy the bill. I would rather have a half loaf than no loaf.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] desire to be heard?

Mr. MAPES. I do not care to discuss the point of order. It seems to me that my amendment is clearly germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman where he got this printed matter?

Mr. MAPES. It is sections 6 and 7 of the bill as first introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. MANN. It is the same bill.

Mr. MAPES. It is from the same bill with these sections taken out.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The committee did not think it was germane to the main object of the bill and cut those provisions out.

Mr. MANN. The committee of the Senate did not want to take away their power, I suppose.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The committee of the House eliminated it.

Mr. MANN. It was eliminated in the Senate. The House did not act upon it until they found they could not put it through the Senate.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. The House committee reported this bill with these provisions out of it before the Senate passed the bill that has been considered here to-day.

Mr. MANN. That is all true; but the gentleman found he could not pass it through the Senate with these amendments in it. Let us be on the square about these things. That is true of a previous Congress and true of this Congress.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I did not and do not think we could pass it through this House with this amendment in it.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether you could or not. We were not relinquishing any power by the amendment; we were asking the other body to do it, and we were perfectly certain they were not going to do it.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced this amendment at the request of the National Civil Service Reform League. The amendment is taken verbatim from sections 6 and 7 of a bill introduced in May, 1914, by the chairman of the committee that reported this bill. On May 19, 1914, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] introduced a bill along the line of the Senate bill which we are now considering, with these two paragraphs in it. Subsequently he introduced another bill with those two sections and section 5 of the Senate bill, which he had in his first bill, eliminated. This last bill was reported favorably by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House. The bill as originally introduced in the Senate by Senator STONE also contained sections 6 and 7, the section which I propose to reinstate by my amendment as well as section 5.

The National Civil Service Reform League approved and recommended the bill as originally introduced by the gentleman from Virginia. With these sections taken out, however, they say that the point of the bill is destroyed, and that they do not support it.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS. Does not the gentleman think that it stands about like this: That this bill as originally introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] contained two good provisions, each independent, each desirable, standing on its own legs, and that as the result of that amendment one of the good things has been taken out, but that a good one remains behind?

Mr. MAPES. In answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] I will say that the Senate bill does contain one section recommended by the Civil Service Reform League, but which the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House eliminated, providing for efficiency reports and promotions from the efficiency list. It is a good feature, which was not in the bill as reported from the House committee. I intended to introduce the three sections if the House bill had been taken up, but we are considering the Senate bill, which has left the efficiency section in, and the chairman of the committee assured us that he would not attempt to have it stricken out.

In further answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I would like to read just one paragraph from a letter which I have from the National Civil Service Reform League, which says that—

> In the opinion of the league, however, the bill (H. R. 18654) is largely devoid of its usefulness without these sections. * * *
> The main purpose of the original bill was to enact into statute the provisions of the Executive orders providing for examination for admission to the Consular and Diplomatic Services promulgated by President Roosevelt on June 27, 1906, and President Taft on November 26, 1909, the first order relating mainly to the Consular Service and the second order extending the same system to the Diplomatic Service.

Those who have been interested in the Consular Service, business men and others, have been endeavoring for a number of years to improve this service. Now, we propose to take away all the examination features of the Diplomatic Service except as they are promulgated by Executive order.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman is not that the case now?

Mr. MAPES. That is the case now.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Does not the gentleman think that in the past eight years the Consular Service of this country has greatly improved?

Mr. MAPES. I think it has, and we might have—perhaps not under this administration—but we might have an Executive order that would take these men from under these examinations, the same as we had an Executive order under this administration taking out of the civil service the fourth-class postmasters which were put under the civil service by President Taft. I have not heard any objection, Mr. Speaker, to the amendment which I have proposed, putting back into the bill the two sections which have been taken out. The only opposition to the amendment that I have heard is based upon the assumption that it might jeopardize or prejudice the passage of the bill in another body. If it is a good thing, let us incorporate it in this bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MAPES. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating a letter from the National Civil Service Reform League.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the document named. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

NATIONAL CIVIL SERVICE REFORM LEAGUE,
New York, September 15, 1914.

Hon. CARL E. MAPES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN MAPES: Inasmuch as it is understood that a special rule is likely to be passed at any time bringing up for immediate consideration Mr. FLOOD's bill (H. R. 18654) providing for the appointment of secretaries in the Diplomatic Service and appointments in the Consular Service, I venture to call your attention to certain facts with respect to the bill. On May 19 Mr FLOOD introduced a bill (H. R. 16680) making the same provisions as the bill mentioned above, with three additional sections, two providing that candidates for entrance to the Diplomatic and Consular Service shall be subjected to a qualifying examination, the other providing that efficiency records of employees in the Diplomatic and Consular Service shall be submitted to the President in order that promotions may be based upon an accurate record. The National Civil Service Reform League was glad to register its hearty approval of the bill in that form, and it did so in letters to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

In the opinion of the league, however, the bill H. R. 18654 is largely devoid of its usefulness without these sections. Without insuring some system of examination for appointees in the foreign service, no matter how adequate the salary schedule and the method of designating incumbent's terms, there can be no guaranty that appointments will not be made for political considerations. The examinations provided for in the original bill are noncompetitive, but the league has indorsed the measure because it represents the best system obtainable under the existing circumstances and at the present time. The Constitution stands absolutely in the way of a requirement that the President must make selections from the top of an eligible list.

The main purpose of the original bill was to enact into statute the provisions of the Executive orders providing for examinations for admission to the Consular and Diplomatic Service promulgated by President Roosevelt on June 27, 1906, and President Taft on November 26, 1909, the first order relating mainly to the Consular Service and the second order extending the same system to the Diplomatic Service.

The secretary of this league in 1912, during the consideration of a similar bill introduced by Congressman Sulzer, made a thorough investigation into the actual working of the Executive orders and examined the records of the Department of State in regard to these examinations. This investigation showed conclusively that, while the orders had not excluded political considerations from appointments, the maintenance of a high standard of examinations has led to the elimination of the old class of place hunters and the substitution of men of good education and capacity to the benefit of the two services. The high standard of these examinations has been maintained and experience has shown that they are successful in weeding out the incompetents. A list of competent persons is created from which the President may select in his discretion, and the constitutional rights of the Senate are protected by the procedure outlined above by the fact that no attempt is made to interfere with its power to confirm or fail to confirm as it sees fit.

It is most desirable that some provisions be made in the bill for the keeping of efficiency records of various employees in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, so that promotions may be made on the basis of merit and fitness. Section 5 of Mr. FLOOD's bill, H. R. 16680, provides that the Secretary of State shall make his recommendations for promotion to the President on the efficiency records which shall be kept in his department. This provision would attract qualified persons who desire to make the foreign service their career, as advancement would depend upon service records.

It is almost inconceivable in this day and generation that a backward step should be taken by a new administration in view of these results, which would sacrifice the business interests of the country by turning these positions back into the spoils arena and permitting again the appointment of incompetents for political considerations; but the system should not be allowed to be imperiled by the fact that it rests only on Executive discretion, when there is no constitutional or other valid objection to its enactment into law.

On behalf of the league, therefore, I venture to ask that you use your influence to secure the insertion in the bill, H. R. 18654, introduced by Mr. FLOOD on September 3 of sections 5, 6, and 7 of his bill, H. R. 16680, introduced on May 19.

Very truly, yours,
HARRY W. MARSH,
Assistant Secretary.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent to return to section 1 of the bill and to offer again an amendment to that section which I previously offered, but which I did not press because of the belief that its adoption might imperil the bill in conference. But inasmuch as the bill has to go to conference anyway——

Mr. MANN. It does not have to go to conference.

Mr. ROGERS. The chairman of the committee told me it would have to go to conference. I understand I have the approval of the chairman in offering this amendment?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] asks unanimous consent to return to section 1 so as to offer an amendment which he offered earlier in the day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, the amendment is to strike out the first proviso in section 1 and insert in lieu thereof the following language, which was included as a proviso in the bill as originally reported to the House from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 10, of the Senate engrossed copy by striking out the proviso beginning in line 10, which reads as follows: "Provided, That no officer may be assigned for duty in the Department of State for a period of more than three years, unless the public interests demand further service, when such assignment may be extended for a period not to exceed one year and no longer," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That any such officer may be assigned for duty in the Department of State without loss of grade, class, or salary, such assignment to be for a period of not more than three years, unless the public interests demand further service, when such assignment may be extended for a period of not to exceed one year and no longer."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I see a difference in the language. But what is the difference in the effect of the two propositions?

Mr. ROGERS. It was not clear to me, and I think it was not clear to a majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that a secretary when recalled to the State Department for temporary service would, under the original language, retain his grade and class and salary; this ambiguity was called to the attention of some of the officials of the State Department, who agreed that it was desirable that there should be no possibility of dispute upon this point.

Mr. MANN. The Senate proposition does not provide that. It provides for the assignment to the Department of State.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The man is in a certain grade as a certain officer with a certain salary. When you assign him he, of course, retains his grade and salary.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman understands that the right of a secretary to retain while temporarily in departmental work his full secretarial salary is a departure and a modification of the present practice in that regard?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; but now we appoint a man as a consular officer at a particular port, and when he leaves there and goes into the State Department he is not performing the duties for which he is appointed; but when a man is appointed as consul in a certain place, he may be in Persia, or he may be in the United States doing some work. I do not think there is any possible question myself about the effect of it. It certainly would not be contemplated that we would authorize a consul to be transferred to the State Department without any salary.

Mr. ROGERS. The presumption would be that as at present he would then take the salary of the ordinary clerk in that department.

Mr. MANN. But he can not draw his salary now as consul, because he is not at his post.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not suppose it is necessary that a man be at his post in order that he may be able to draw his salary.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; it is.

Mr. ROGERS. He can be on leave temporarily.

Mr. MANN. He might be on leave temporarily; but he can not be on leave temporarily and transferred to some other place, under the law. Now, they are violating the law at this time, or straining it, at least, and that is one reason for the urgency of passing this bill, I suppose. During the war in Europe a number of consular officers have been transferred from one place to another. Under the law they are not entitled to draw their salaries. Well, they are winking at that. So far the comptroller or the auditor have not held them up. Probably they have not discovered it officially, and that is one of the reasons for haste on this bill. There is no question that under this bill, if a man is assigned to the State Department, he is in a particular grade to which he is appointed and confirmed.

Mr. ROGERS. But he is doing different work, and he may be considered, as before, to be doing the work at the salary provided for that work in the Department of State. At all events, this makes it clear beyond peradventure.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection. I wondered why the Senate used other language. What was the reason for that?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Because that was the way it was drawn in the bill as originally introduced.

Mr. ROGERS. That is the identical language embodied in the original bill introduced in the Senate by Senator STONE, and this is a perfecting amendment adopted by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House. There is no question as to the desirability of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will ask to have the similar House bill (H. R. 18654) laid on the table.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that House bill 18654 lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the corresponding House bill (H. R. 18654) be laid on the table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 20975) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, and with the accompanying report (No. 1287), ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reserves all points of order on the bill.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING AT ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement to the House. It will take but a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, this morning the bill (H. R. 18783) to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building and site at St. Petersburg, Fla., was objected to. I want to say that the situation there is this: In this city of St. Petersburg, Fla., which has a population of 20,000 or 25,000 people, land can not be bought for less than it can be bought for in the average city of 100,000 to 150,000 people. If this bill passes, the outside appropriation will be only $120,000. The postal receipts last year were practically $45,000. The lease which the Government had on a building that was occupied as a post office has expired, and I am reliably informed that the Government was out in the street because the owners of the property could rent it to private persons for a sum that the Government could not afford to pay, and the Government is to-day occupying the city hall in that town, by the grace of the city, for postal purposes. I ask unanimous consent to return to that bill, and for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to return to the bill which he mentions. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. KENT. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Florida——

Mr. KENT. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California demands the regular order. The regular order is to put the question, Is there objection? If nobody objects——

Mr. DONOVON. I am going to object if I can not get some information.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Let the gentleman ask his question. It will take only a minute.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. DONOVAN. Does the gentleman from Florida have any information about how many other public buildings the State of Florida has for its first and second class post offices at the present time?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The State of Florida has a number of public buildings.

Mr. DONOVAN. How many?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not know how many—Jacksonville for one.

Mr. DONOVAN. You do not know anything about it, do you?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; I do. I can tell you if the House will give me the time.

Mr. DONOVAN. You do not know about the lease expiring, do you?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do.

Mr. DONOVAN. Has the lease expired?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have the word of the Comptroller of the Treasury, Judge Downey.

Mr. DONOVAN. Is that all you know about it?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have no reason to doubt it.

Mr. DONOVAN. I want to tell the gentleman that it has not.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman doubts the word of Judge Downey. That is a question between him and Judge Downey; that is all.

Mr. DONOVAN. One thing more. The lease at St. Petersburg has not expired, and the population stated by the gentleman is not correct, and the number of post offices in the State is a matter of conjecture with him. I will say further that there is an immense amount of money collected for public buildings and other purposes; and shall we dump it all into such States as Florida?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order. If the gentleman wants to object, let him object.

Mr. DONOVAN. I will make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that it is not proper to go back to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

Mr. ADAMSON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. ADAMSON. To submit a request for unanimous consent. I have no personal bill of my own, but I call attention to the bill H. R. 8904, a bill to establish a life-saving station at the mouth of the Siuslaw River, Oreg., for the Lighthouse Service, which service asked for that one little project out on the Pacific coast. I ask unanimous consent that it may be immediately considered.

Mr. MANN. I think it ought to be reached in the regular order.

Mr. ADAMSON. But it will not be reached in the regular order. Will not the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut demands the regular order. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the Clerk will read the next bill.

USE OF PORTIONS OF NATIONAL FORESTS FOR RECREATION PURPOSES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 17780) providing for the use of certain portions or spaces of ground within the national forests for recreation purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture may, upon such terms as he may deem proper and for periods not exceeding 20 years, permit responsible persons or associations to use and occupy suitable spaces or portions of ground in the national forests for the construction of summer homes, hotels, stores, or other structures needed for recreation or public convenience, not exceeding 5 acres in area to any one person or association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like some information from gentlemen from far Western States where they have so many forest reserves. I was under the impression that the gentlemen from the coast were protesting against the forest reserves because the lumber could not be marketed. The query comes to my mind that as this bill is intended to depart from the policy of forestation and turn these reserves into pleasure grounds, or national parks, that there is a conflict between the two ideas of keeping the forest reserves for forestation and making them national parks and allowing hotel proprietors to erect hotels in favored places.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think there is no conflict between the two policies. There are many places in the forests that are very beautiful in natural scenery and useful for fishing and hunting, and where there are many natural wonders. I have one particular place in mind as an illustration. Near Grants Pass, in Jackson County, Oreg., there is a place known as the Oregon Caves, some 25 miles from the city. The people will build a road over the lands belonging to private individuals to assist in facilitating access to the proposed park. The caves are of vast extent and great interest, and unless some provision is made by which people going there can receive accommodations, they can not very well visit them. If they can have permission, if the Secretary of Agriculture can have authority to lease a small area of ground for the building of a hotel, people can go and enjoy the scenery and the fishing and hunting. It is a most beautiful place. This is only one instance, as adjacent to many communities there are places of great scenic beauty and interest that could be so used by the people. It will be for the benefit of the forest reserve in which it is located to have visitors come into them under the conditions proposed in this bill. The roads that will be built will help the forest officers in patrolling the forest, and the presence of a large body of people who always turn out to fight the fire will assist the foresters in fighting fires in that vicinity should they occur.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman what would prevent in the case instanced by him of creating it into a national monument if these special caves to which the gentleman refers have a scenic value. Why can not the department create it into a national monument?

Mr. HAWLEY. It would be less expensive to have it in the forest reserve, as proposed here, than to have it exist as a monument. During the winter when no people are there, the foresters can look after it, without extra cost. If it is a national monument, it would be without care, and there would be danger from fire and other causes. Unless an additional officer was provided it would be without care for a part of the year.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can appreciate that while in this instance the local people might be willing to expend money in building a road, if we adopted a general policy permitting the building of hotels on long-term leases, that there would arise a great demand for the building of roads, so as to turn the forest reserves proper into national parks.

Mr. HAWLEY. I doubt if that will ever be done to any great extent.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a very present doubt in my mind.

Mr. HAWLEY. There are in certain places natural wonders, which people would like to visit as campers and to secure recreation. At present the people have an unlimited right to go upon the public land in the national forests. They can go there and build a temporary camp, put up a tent or a little camp of some kind. They are given now by the Secretary of Agriculture permission to construct temporary structures. But it does not enable them to put up any important building, or justify any considerable expenditure. But if they could get permission for a period of years they can afford to put up a better building and will have an interest in protecting that particular locality, and if they have a building in which they can put a stove there is not the same danger of forest fires as if they built it outside. The Secretary of Agriculture and the Chief Forester are very much in favor of this legislation, as the following letter indicates:

JULY 22, 1914.

Hon. A. F. LEVER,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. LEVER: I wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter of July 11, inclosing a copy of the bill (H. R. 17780) introduced by Mr. HAWLEY, providing for the use of certain portions or spaces of ground within the national forests for recreation purposes.

You will probably recall that in the hearings (p. 302) on the bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, Mr. Graves testified at some length on the need for just such legislation, requiring summer-residence leases, as is proposed in the bill. As a result of his testimony, your committee added an amendment to the Agriculture appropriation bill, which was substantially the language used in Mr. HAWLEY'S bill, now referred here for report. The amendment to the Agriculture appropriation bill went out, however, on a point of order made by one of the Members.

There is at the present time some hesitancy on the part of persons who want to use national-forest land upon which to construct summer residences, hotels, stores, and other structures involving a large expenditure, because of the indefinite tenure of the permits to them which the present law provides for. At the present time, however, there are several thousand such permits in use, upon which structures have been erected. In justice to those who desire to construct more substantial improvements it is believed that the present law should be amended to give persons a better right than the revocable permit now authorized.

For the reasons given above this department would approve of the passage of the bill.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON,
Secretary.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have been benefited by the gentleman's information as to the fact that the public can go there and locate temporarily from season to season, and I think that is better than to grant a permit to hotel proprietors to build for 20 years.

Mr. FERRIS rose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

QUITCLAIM DEED TO CERTAIN LANDS IN AKRON, OHIO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18550) empowering and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey by quitclaim certain lands in the city of Akron, State of Ohio.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, empowered and directed to convey, by the usual quitclaim deed, to the city of Akron, in the State of Ohio, for street purposes and no other, the northeasterly 5 feet of the new Federal-building site at the southwesterly corner of East Market and Prospect Streets, in said city.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

Mr. DONOVAN. Did the gentleman from Florida notice that objection?

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 18550.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 18550, with Mr. UNDERWOOD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk again read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no general debate, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule. [After a pause.] The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 3 and 4 and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to convey by the usual quitclaim."

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, that amendment was suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury as giving him the discretion to make this conveyance instead of as in the original bill, directing him to make the conveyance. The committee has no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18550 and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLARK of Florida, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK, COLO.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 6309) to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park, in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes, with the amendments, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the tract of land in the State of Colorado particularly described by and included within metes and bounds as follows, to wit: Beginning at the southeast corner of section 34, township 3 north, range 73 west of the sixth principal meridian, Colorado, thence north along the section lines to the northeast corner of section 3, said township; thence west to the northwest corner of said section; thence north along the section lines to the northeast corner of section 16, township 4 north, range 73 west; thence west to the northwest corner of said section; thence north to the northeast corner of section 8, said township; thence west along the section lines to the northwest corner of section 7, said township; thence north to the northeast corner of township 4 north, range 74 west; thence west along the first correction line north, to the southeast corner of section 36, township 5 north, range 74 west; thence north along the range line to the northeast corner of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 13, said township; thence west to the northwest corner of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 14, said township; thence north to the northwest corner of the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 11, said township; thence east to the northeast corner of the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 12, said township; thence south along the range lines to the southeast corner of said section; thence east along the section lines to the southeast corner of the southwest quarter of section 10, township 5 north, range 73 west; thence north to the northeast corner of the southwest quarter of said section; thence east to the southeast corner of the northeast quarter of said section; thence north to the northeast corner of said section; thence east to the southeast corner of the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 2, said township; thence north to the northeast corner of the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of said section; thence east to the southeast corner of the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter, said section; thence north to the northeast corner of the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of said section; thence east to the southeast corner of the northeast quarter of section 1, said township; thence north along the range line to the northeast corner of section 36, township 7 north, range 73 west; thence west along the section lines to the intersection with the west bank of the Big South Cache la Poudre River in township 7 north, range 75 west; thence southeasterly along the west bank of said river to the mouth of a tributary of said river, probably in section 1, township 6 north, range 75 west; said tributary heading at La Poudre Pass in section 20, township 6 north, range 75 west; thence southwesterly along the west bank of said tributary to its head; thence across the Continental Divide to the headwaters of the North Fork of the Grand River, which also heads at La Poudre Pass; thence down the west bank of the North Fork of the Grand River to its intersection with the section line between sections 29 and 30, township 6 north, range 75 west; thence south along the section lines to the southeast corner of section 18, township 5 north, range 75 west; thence west along the section line to its intersection with the west bank of the North Fork of the Grand River; thence down the west bank of the North Fork of the Grand River to its intersection with the section line between sections 25 and 36, township 4 north, range 76 west; thence east to the northeast corner of section 36, said township; thence south along the range line to the southeast corner of said township; thence east along the township line to the northeast corner of the northwest quarter of section 4, township 3 north, range 75 west; thence south to the southwest corner of the northeast quarter of section 9, said township; thence west along the quarter section line to its intersection with a creek in section 7, said township, this creek being an outlet of Grand Lake, and flowing into the North Fork of the Grand River; thence southerly along the said creek to its junction with the North Fork of the Grand River; thence southerly along the west bank of the North Fork of the Grand River to its intersection with the township line between townships 2 and 3 north; thence east along the township line to the southeast corner of section 34, township 3 north, range 73 west of the sixth principal meridian, Colorado, the place of beginning, all of said above-described tract now being included within the boundaries of the counties of Grand, Boulder, and Larimer, in the State of Colorado, is hereby reserved and withdrawn from settlement, occupancy, or disposal under the laws of the United States, and said tract is dedicated and set apart as a public park for the benefit and enjoyment of the people of the United States, under the name of the Rocky Mountain National Park: Provided, That the United States Reclamation Service may enter upon and utilize for flowage or other purposes any area within said park which may be necessary for the development and maintenance of a Government reclamation project.

SEC. 2. That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid existing claim, location, or entry under the land laws of the United States, whether for homestead, mineral, right of way, or any other purpose whatsoever, or shall affect the rights of any such claimant, locator, or entryman to the full use and enjoyment of his land. Whenever consistent with the primary purposes of the park the act of February 15, 1901, applicable to the location of rights of way in certain national parks and the national forests for irrigation and other purposes, shall be and remain applicable to the lands included within the park. The Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion and upon such conditions as he may deem wise, grant easements or rights of way for steam, electric, or similar transportation upon or across the park.

SEC. 3. That no lands located within the park boundaries now held in private, municipal, or State ownership shall be affected by or subject to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. That the said park shall be under the executive control of the Secretary of the Interior, and it shall be the duty of the said executive authority, as soon as practicable, to make and publish such reasonable rules and regulations not inconsistent with the laws of the United States as the said authority may deem necessary or proper for the care, protection, management, and improvement of the same, the said regulations being primarily aimed at the freest use of the said park for recreation purposes by the public and for the preservation of the natural conditions and scenic beauties thereof. The said authority may, in his discretion, execute leases to parcels of ground not exceeding 20 acres in extent in any one place to any person or company for not to exceed 20 years whenever such ground is necessary for the erection of establishments for the accommodation of visitors, may grant such other necessary privileges and concessions as he deems wise for the accommodation of visitors and may likewise arrange for the removal of such mature or dead or down timber as he may deem necessary and advisable for the protection and improvement of the park. The regulations governing the park shall include provisions for the use of automobiles therein. All funds derived from concessions, privileges, or other sources within the park shall be expended therein: Provided, That no appropriation for the maintenance, supervision, or improvement of said park in excess of $10,000 annually shall be made unless the same shall have first been expressly authorized by law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAY). Is a second demanded?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania to 20 minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, in arising to present this bill to the House I want to take this first opportunity of expressing to the Speaker the profound appreciation of the State of Colorado for granting my earnest appeal and placing this bill at the head of the Suspension Calendar to-day. With the many thousands of bills before us there was no other possible way that it ever could have been reached for consideration at this session of Congress, or probably within the next year, and I know my constituents will forever feel grateful for his act of special consideration to my State.

I want to also thank the Public Lands Committee for granting my request for a full and patient hearing upon the bill and their authorizing me to make this favorable and unanimous report.

I am aware that it is not customary to publicly express gratitude in this way; but very few people realize the tremendous importance of this measure to Colorado, and I know that this brief acknowledgment is but a very feeble expression of the sentiment of my constituents.

The committee accorded me the privilege of conducting the hearings upon this bill and I presented our retiring governor, Elias M. Ammons; our incoming governor, George A. Carlson; both of our United States Senators, CHARLES S. THOMAS and JOHN F. SHAFROTH; and Mr. R. B. Marshall, the Chief Geographer of the United States Geological Survey, who had made an exhaustive examination of and report on this proposed park; also Mr. Mark Daniels, the general superintendent and landscape engineer of national parks. The committee was also favored with a very attractive presentation by Mr. F. W. Byerly, which I wish you all could have seen, of stereopticon natural-color views of the park. I also presented a large amount of data upon this subject that had been sent to me by many associations and people throughout the country.

In my printed report upon this bill, covering 48 pages, I have incorporated a synopsis of what was presented at the hearing, as well as some other relevant and, I think, interesting information.

INTRODUCTORY.

The project of establishing a national park in this region was started several years ago by a number of our public-spirited citizens. A bill for that purpose was introduced in the Sixty-second Congress, but nothing whatever was done or attempted to be done with it during that Congress. I was requested by a great many people to take the matter up at that time, but I did not do so, because a few enthusiastic individuals were very industriously trying to include a large part of four counties, and embracing some 800,000 acres of land, much of which was mineral land, a large amount of it agricultural land, and a considerable portion was patented and privately owned land. After a large amount of correspondence and many conferences with the chambers of commerce, business men's organizations, and enterprising citizens of Denver, Boulder, and Grand Counties, as well as the Interior Department, and after Secretary Fisher had sent Mr. Marshall out to examine the territory in the fall of 1912, and Mr. Marshall had made his report in January, 1913, Senator THOMAS and I finally succeeded in bringing about an agreement between the Interior and Agricultural Departments and the inhabitants of Larimer, Boulder, and Grand Counties, and the Denver Chamber of Commerce and Real Estate Exchange and others as to the proper boundaries of the park and the appropriate provisions of the bill. Thereupon a compromise bill was prepared in duplicate, and on the opening day of the first session of this Sixty-third Congress, April 7, 1913, I introduced it—H. R. 1634—and on April 8 Senator THOMAS introduced it in the Senate—S. 530.

Those bills were referred to the Interior and Agriculture Departments and investigated and considered by those departments for about 15 months, and after many more conferences and further investigations and correspondence—I have written hundreds and hundreds of letters about this bill—it was determined to eliminate further lands and reduce the size of the park to about one-third of its original contemplated dimensions. So the bill was again rewritten and reintroduced in the Senate by Senator THOMAS on June 29, 1914, as Senate bill 6007, and a few days afterwards as the present bill (S. 6309), and again reintroduced in the House by myself as House bill 17614, on July 2, 1914. Those bills were again referred to the two departments, and I have incorporated their reports on this bill, which is the fourth amended bill, in my report.

I mention these preliminary matters merely so that the House may know that this is not a hastily prepared or unduly considered measure.

There has been a world of detail work put upon this bill during the past three years by the department officials and by Senator THOMAS and myself, and we have all along been greatly assisted by Mr. Frederick R. Ross, the chairman of the Rocky Mountain National Park Committee of the Denver Chamber of Commerce and the Denver Real Estate Exchange, and by former United States Senator Thomas M. Patterson, Gov. Ammons, and Mr. John C. Shaffer, proprietor of the Rocky Mountain News, and many other organizations and people prominent in Colorado affairs whom I would like to mention.

The Secretaries of both the Interior and Agriculture Departments are now heartily in favor of this bill in its present amended form. I asked for and obtained an additional report from the Interior Department as late as January 9, 1915, in which Secretary Lane says:

> I favor the creation of the Rocky Mountain National Park in the State of Colorado. It will give to the country a new national playground, having unsurpassed mountain scenery and a most salubrious climate, and which will be in proximity to the great centers of population in the eastern portion of the United States. I am confident that the affairs of this park could be administered at a moderate cost.

This bill is supported by our State legislature, all political parties, the city of Denver, and a great many business men's organizations, and, in fact, by the entire population of Colorado. There are over 800,000 citizens in my State who are to-day anxiously looking, hoping, and appealing to this House to pass this bill, and if you grant their appeal there will be more general heartfelt rejoicing than there has been over any local measure since the passage by Congress in 1876 of the enabling act by which the Territory of Colorado was admitted into the Union as the Centennial State. However, Colorado is not alone in her appeal for this bill. The National Federation of Women's Clubs, including a million of the good women of this country, are enthusiastically supporting the measure. The Daughters of the American Revolution and hundreds of outing clubs, recreation associations, and unselfish, patriotic, and public-spirited organizations all over the United States have passed resolutions and written me indorsing this bill. I have mentioned a number of these and set out a few of the indorsements in both the hearings and in my report here before us.

DESCRIPTION.

I can not take the time, as I would like, to give a detailed description of the marvelously beautiful region that is sought to be created into a national park. But I will say generally that the area contains 229,062 acres, or 350 square miles of gorgeous scenery. All of it, excepting 3,082 acres, are now included in the Arapahoe and Colorado National Forests. All of the land, excepting 11,200 acres, is surveyed land. There are 2,340 acres of patented land and 1,200 acres of State land in the park, and all the rest of it is public domain. It will be the fourth in size of our national parks. It is situated on the crest of this continent on the main range of the backbone of the Rocky Mountains in the most rugged section of the Continental Divide, about one half on the Atlantic and the other half on the Pacific slope. The territory is located about one-half in Grand County, one-third in Larimer, and one-sixth in Boulder County, and about 60 miles northwest of the city of Denver in the northern-central part of the State. The territory is the source of a number of tributaries of some of our large rivers. The waters from the eastern part ultimately flow into the Missouri River, while on the western slope of the peaks the melting snows reach the Pacific Ocean through the Colorado River. The lowest part of the region is at an altitude of 8,000 feet, and the greater part of it is over 9,000 feet above sea level.

There are over 60 peaks that rise above 12,000 feet and a dozen exceed 13,000 feet within 10 miles along the Continental Divide, with Longs Peak rising 14,255 feet above the ocean's tides—145 feet higher than Pikes Peak. While Longs Peak lacks a few feet of being the highest peak in Colorado, yet, owing to its rugged nature and marvelous surroundings, in a panorama of scenic grandeur, in the heart of the Rockies, it is looked upon as America's gem, and is often called the "King of the Rockies," and frequently compared to Mount Blanc and the Matterhorn. Colorado is the top of the world, and my description of Longs Peak would be the bright jewel set in the crest of the Rockies, where it shines as the Kohinoor of all the gems of this Continent.

In her book, A Lady's Life in the Rocky Mountains, Miss Isabella L. Bird describes one view of the peak as follows:

Deep, vast canyons, all trending westward, lie in purple gloom. Pine-clad ridges, rising into the blasted top of Storm Peak, all run westward, too, and all the beauty and glory are but the frame out of which rises—heaven piercing, pure in its pearly luster, as glorious a mountain as the sun tinges red in either hemisphere—the splintered, pinnacled, lovely, ghostly, impossible, double-peaked summit of Longs Peak, the Mount Blanc of northern Colorado.

But Longs Peak is only one of the many wonderful features of this park. Nature has lavished many of her choicest gifts upon this region. The entire region is equal in grandeur to the Swiss Alps, and it surpasses Switzerland in the varied glory of its magnificence. There are several large glaciers and one extinct volcano in the park. It is a veritable wonderland. There are many beautiful small parks and valleys, while the foliage is perfectly gorgeous. There is a ruggedness and grandeur in the scenery which no one can describe. It must be seen to be realized.

There are nearly 200 lakes, varying in size from a few rods to a half a mile across. A dozen of the peaks within the park are capped with perennial snow. There are many scraggy peaks, deep canyons, and snow fields; hundreds of cascades and many passes in the Continental Divide above an altitude of 12,000 feet. The timber line, the altitude above which trees will not grow, in the Alps is about 6,500 feet elevation, while in the Rocky Mountains in this proposed park the timber line is 11,500 feet.

There are many kinds of wild life, including the mountain sheep (bighorn); grizzly bear, black and brown bear, deer, and beavers abound; all the lakes and streams contain mountain trout; and a herd of elk has recently been brought from the Jackson Hole, in Wyoming, and placed in the park.

Owing to the wide range of climate, from summer moderation to the perpetual snow line, it is estimated that there are in the park a thousand varieties of wild flowers. The colombine, the official State flower of Colorado, and which we think is the most exquisitely beautiful flower in the world, grows in luxuriant profusion all over the sides of these mountains. It is a native mountain flower, and only grows naturally in that high altitude. Besides the flowers, there is a much greater variety of plant life than is found in the Alps.

There is comparatively little timber that is of a merchantable value, and there is no agricultural land in the park; and, moreover, the altitude is too great for practical farming, and there is very little grazing possibilities in that region. In fact, it has been said thousands of times by people from all over the world that the one great and only thing this region is suitable for is a great national park. It has no value for anything but scenery and climate.

Some of the greatest known travelers, authors, and naturalists of the world have for the past 40 years visited this territory and paid tribute to its scenic worth by writing books and articles upon it. In fact, Estes Park and Grand Lake and the adjacent territory included in this bill have long since attained not only a nation-wide reputation, but are known almost as well throughout Europe as they are in this country. The park is visited every summer by tens of thousands of people because of its scenic beauty and delightful mountain summer climate. Last summer there were 20,250 people visited the Yellowstone National Park, while it is estimated that over 50,000 people visited Estes Park, and many of them stayed there practically the entire summer, because it is not only a very invigorating and healthful climate, but one of the most delightful places in the world. Nowhere in the long range of the Continental Divide is there such scenery as that of this region. This bill will nationalize the State's most beautiful park and will capitalize Colorado's scenery for the benefit of the Nation. Some of the Nation's greatest attractions, from the tourist's standpoint, are located in Colorado.

It is eminently fitting that this region should be selected by Congress and given the name of "the Rocky Mountain National Park." No one can behold and contemplate the magnificent scenery of this region without being bigger and better ever thereafter.

For over 40 years Estes Park has been famous to travelers and tourists, who include it in their intinerary. Kit Carson went through there in 1840. The first house was built there in 1860 by Joel Estes, after whom the park was named. He was one of the earliest settlers of Colorado, who made his home there when it was a wilderness. Later on it became a resort for tourists and an attractive holiday place for thousands of people.

There were 10,000 automobiles from outside the State that visited the park last year, and it is estimated that fully 25,000 nonresident automobiles and from 125,000 to 150,000 people from all over the United States will visit the park this coming summer. One of the greatest and most important features of this park will be its inexpensive, easy, and ready accessibility It will be a glorious and immensely popular resort. It will be the one great national park on the eastern slope of our country, and at least one day nearer and much more accessible to the population of the country than any other national park. It will be the one great national recreation ground that will be the most available to all the people, and I predict that more people will visit this park every year than visit all the other parks combined.

By the adoption of this measure one of Colorado's most beautiful districts will be dedicated forever to public use and will be maintained as a national monument for the enlightenment and inspiration of the people of the United States; and Colorado will always be grateful to Congress for the creation of this park. It will indeed make Colorado the great "playground of the Nation." It will soon be the most popular of all the national parks.

All people need recreation, and there is a very great and growing demand for public recreation places out of doors. The tendency of the times, the modern business habits of our people, are such that they will be compelled to more and more seek outdoor life, and these recreation places will be a Godsend to their health and shattered nerves, and benefit the lives of many millions of people physically, mentally, and morally every year. The grown-up children of the Nation need parks just as much as the little ones do.

We want to consecrate this territory to the public use as a national playground. We cordially invite the people of our country to come and be invigorated by and enjoy this delightful spot, the scenery of which is not surpassed by any park or anywhere on earth.

Our State highway commission and the city of Denver and those counties are building magnificent automobile roads from Denver and all the adjoining cities and towns to and across the park. So that everyone can go. There will be no trust or monopoly of any of the highways leading to or through this park. All western railroads run to Denver, and from there it is only a three hours' delightful automobile ride, and it is less than that from the cities of Boulder and Loveland. Many thousands of people will every year come from the east, north, and south in their automobiles over the Lincoln National Highway.

Our people are especially anxious to have this park created now on account of the European war and the Panama-Pacific Exposition, so that the traveling public may learn of its attractive features during the coming summer and be benefited thereby.

The American people have never yet capitalized our scenery and climate, as we should. It is one of our most valuable assets, and these great assets should be realized upon to the fullest extent. We receive comparatively nothing for it, while Switzerland derives from $10,000 to $40,000 per square mile per year for scenery that is not equal to ours. But Switzerland knows that the public is ready and willing to pay for scenery and they have developed it for selling purposes. It is estimated that the American people spend approximately $500,000,000 a year abroad, and a considerable portion of it goes to see scenery that in no way compares with our own. Besides, our mountains are endowed with a climate so far superior to that of the Old World that this park will soon become the mecca of the tourists of the earth.

Now is the time to cultivate the "See America First" movement. We should systematically turn the attention of the American tourists to the fact that there is grander and more beautiful scenery in this country than elsewhere, and keep at home some of the hundreds of millions of dollars of tourist money that is now annually spent abroad. A large per cent of the American population scarcely know that we have national parks, and most of them only have the vaguest notion of what our natural scenic resources are. The closing of European resorts to American travel this year has developed this "See America First" spirit and will be of great aid in the teaching of American citizens to visit and appreciate our own parks. Tens of thousands of Americans who have every year spent their surplus money in Europe will, on account of the present war, many of them visit the mountains, and a large per cent of them will inevitably visit the Rocky Mountain National Park; and a very large per cent of all the people who visit the Panama-Pacific Exhibition will stop off at Denver on their trip across the continent and visit this park.

It is estimated that 300,000 Americans visited Europe last year. Switzerland sells to the world $250,000,000 worth of scenery every year. The several hundred million dollars that Americans spend in Europe every year is a net and unnecessary loss to America, because our citizens could derive a better quality of scenery by judiciously spending their money at home. We should popularize our own parks through letting the people know of their beauty and advantages. There should be a tremendous annual movement of our people for vacations in the Government reserves. I hope the Interior Department will use the moving-picture concerns for the purpose of advertising these national parks. Uncle Sam has an unlimited supply of scenery that is worth advertising.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. I demanded a second mainly for the purpose of getting information. I understand some gentlemen may want to oppose the bill. I would like to inquire to what extent the Federal Government will be called upon to bear expense in connection with this enterprise?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will notice, the amendment which the committee has recommended at the end of the bill provides that the entire annual cost is limited to $10,000, unless otherwise authorized by Congress some time hereafter. That amount is not a great deal in excess of what it is now costing the Federal Government to maintain this territory as a part of two forest reserves. Several forest rangers are required to superintend and protect that territory at the present time. In fact, I understand the Forest Service contemplates spending very much larger sums each year than this bill authorizes. There are 14,500,000 acres of forest reserves in Colorado. This park only comprises about 2 per cent of the forest reserves of my State, and I am asking by this bill to transfer the jurisdiction of less than a quarter of a million acres out of our fourteen and a half million acres of forest reserves from the Agriculture Department to the Interior Department, because our people believe that that grand and rare scenic region, which is one of the most beautiful spots in the entire Rocky Mountains, can be much better administered, protected, and delevoped by the national park service of the Interior Department as a national park than it possibly could be under the Forest Service. Forest reserves are not public playgrounds and they are not administered for recreation places. I am asking that this very unique scenery be converted into a national park, so that all the people of the United States may see and enjoy it.

Mr. MOORE. I want the gentleman to have a fair chance to explain the bill, and I call to his attention the fact that the report states that the Colorado Democratic State platform of 1914 contained the following plank:

> We heartily favor the creation of the Rocky Mountain National Park, and commend our Senators and Representatives in Congress for their labor in its behalf.

Are we to understand from that that the bill has any particular political significance?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Not the slightest. If the gentleman will look at page 7 of my report, he will see that I state right in the very next sentence that "all other parties urgently advocated the establishment of the park." I put that in my report to show that the entire State, all organizations and all political parties and everybody, is in favor of it. This is one subject upon which Colorado is absolutely and enthusiastically united. Our legislature has adopted and sent to me a memorial to Congress, which in part says:

> That the people of Colorado desire that said park shall be established. It includes the highest mountain peaks in the State; the area is little adapted to either agriculture or grazing; its scenery for sublimity and grandeur is not excelled on the continent. Its location is easy of access to America's millions who seek health and recreation in the summer months, being situated in the front and main range of the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. MOORE. Now, one further question. I am still seeking information. Why is it that the State of Colorado does not take care of this park itself?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, there is very little use of our discussing that question, because, in the first place, Congress would not under any circumstances cede that territory to the State. It would be wrong for the Government to ever surrender title to that territory. Secondly, Colorado has a large number of beautiful parks. Half of the State is composed of mountain parks. We have three times as much mountain scenery in our State alone as there is in the entire Swiss nation. Our State does not want this as a local State park. We want the Nation to have this marvelous region so the entire population of the United States will feel a proprietary interest in it. We prefer to surrender jurisdiction over the territory to the Federal Government, and let the entire world feel at liberty to come there as the guest of Uncle Sam.

Mr. MOORE. The maintenance of it, for the first year at least, would be limited to $10,000?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is limited to $10,000 a year forever unless Congress grants us an increase.

Mr. MOORE. Ten thousand dollars per annum is all you propose to ask at present?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is all until further additional appropriations are authorized by Congress.

Mr. MOORE. Would $10,000 a year be sufficient to provide for maintenance and take care of future improvements?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; that amount is not enough; but we will have to get along with that sum for a while, and I am in hopes that we will be allowed to also retain and use toward the improvement of the park all the revenues derived from automobile licenses and concessions from all sources. If we can have those receipts, I feel that we can get along without any additional appropriation for possibly several years to come.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman expects some revenue will be derived from the park to make up the expenses?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir. Mr. Marshall and the Interior Department recommend that we be given those receipts for the maintenance and improvement of the park, especially for road and trail building, and I am relying upon these recommendations and that express provision in this bill. I had that in mind when I reluctantly consented to the adoption by the committee of this $10,000 a year limitation.

If Congress will permit Secretary Lane to carry out his ideas concerning these national parks, I confidently believe that in the near future they will all be self-supporting.

There are three different types of revenue that may be received from national parks: First, from the natural resources; second, from the public utilities operated there; and, third, from leases and concessions.

If the Rocky Mountain National Park were a purely local project, the outdoor clubs and other patriotic organizations throughout the United States and representative newspapers everywhere would not be supporting this measure as earnestly as they are. But our State administration and prominent men in Colorado affairs and all of our business men's organizations want this territory placed in a national park, so that its scenic features may be preserved and reserved in perpetuity for the people of the United States.

We already have in southwestern Colorado the Mesa Verde National Park, the ruins of the ancient cliff dwellers. From an archeological viewpoint it is one of the wonders of the world. To me it is the most weird and fascinating place I have ever visited. Mr. Daniels says:

> If any man wants to find Omar Khayyám's lines expressing the eternal thought of "whence we come and why," let him visit those wonderful remains, steep himself in their mystery, and puzzle over the riddle they present. Who built them? When? Whence came they? Whither did they go? No man knows the answer. The pyramids of Egypt are no more impressive, no more awesome.

We also have the wonderfully unique and picturesque Colorado National Monument, near Grand Junction, Colo., which I had the honor of having created, and of naming it in 1911. We have also the Wheeler National Monument, in southern Colorado. I have had the distinction and pleasure of passing through Congress bills granting parks on the public domain to some 20 different cities and towns in my State. And last summer I had charge of the two bills in the committee and House which set apart a 15,000-acre mountain park for the city of Denver, a portion of which was placed in a forest reserve for that purpose. All of our Colorado cities appreciate the importance of having outing places, recreation and pleasure playgrounds. That sentiment is natural to our people because we have so many wonderfully beautiful natural parks in Colorado. I feel that every city in the United States should have a public park large enough to accommodate its entire population and should be maintained and kept in a way that would make it attractive to the old and young. Instead of having 13 national parks in this country we ought to have at least a hundred.

Your Committee on the Public Lands confidently believe that the time is fast approaching when this Government will need and have many more national parks. The tendency in every State and every city in the United States is toward the creation of more outing places. The strenuous life which the American people are living requires outdoor recreation and relaxation, and our city, State, and national parks are one of our greatest health assets. No money ever expended by the Government will bring greater returns in health and happiness than that expended toward the improvement and maintenance of our national parks. Your committee believes that from the natural wonders which the proposed territory contains it should be created into a national park, and therefore unanimously and earnestly recommend the passage of this bill.

Grand Lake adjoins the western boundary of this park and geographically is practically a part of it. It is immediately across the range from Estes Park, and the new State highway which is now approaching completion renders it easy of access from the Estes Park portion of the park. The lake is one of the most interesting, attractive, and picturesque spots in the Rocky Mountains, as well as one of the largest natural lakes in Colorado. The surrounding region is unsurpassed in grandeur for beauty of natural scenery, and at the same time it is intensely interesting from a romantic, legendary, and historical point of view. The lake is the source of the Grand River, one of the two streams that constitute the Colorado River, one of the great rivers of the country that finds its way to the Pacific by way of the Gulf of California. The territory was originally occupied by the Ute Indians, and the legendary history of their wars and tribal strifes is intensely interesting in connection with this park. The lake was also the scene of strife in later years. About 1884 a pitched battle was fought on the shores of the lake involving practically all of the white inhabitants of the county, and several of them were killed. "Patience" Thornton, one of Colorado's early and most successful novelists, used the incident in connection with this county-seat war as the basis of a most realistic story. So that it will live as a part of the record of the region and serve to render the lake a place of historical interest.

Prof. Ellsworth Bethel, of the East Denver High School, has made some valuable researches in the Estes Park region that I think are of sufficient interest to justify being inserted in the RECORD, as follows:

NOTES ON THE NATURAL HISTORY OF THE ESTES PARK REGION.

The flora and fauna of Colorado: Colorado has about 3,000 species of native wild plants, this phenomenally large number being exceeded only by California.

The varying altitude from the Great Plains to the summits, reaching to an elevation of 14,000 feet above sea level, is responsible for the large number of varieties. The flora is acknowledged by all botanists to be the most beautiful, interesting, and varied of any State in the Union.

The proposed Rocky Mountain National Park contains more than 1,500 species, mostly Alpine and sub-Alpine. Many botanists have visited this region and pronounced it one of transcendent interest, and having once visited it they return from year to year. The Rocky Mountain blue columbine (the State flower), acknowledged to be the most beautiful flower in the United States, grows in great profusion. Hardly less attractive are the Mariposa lily, gentians, cowslips, buttercups, bluebells, and harebells in many varieties. The Alpine flora is exceedingly attractive and in variety and brilliancy of color are quite equal to those of the Alps; in fact, many of them are the same as those found in the high mountains of Europe. Attractive forests cover the hills and slopes. These are composed chiefly of pines (three species), spruce (two species), firs (two species), junipers (two species). The aspen, birches, alders, willows, poplars, etc., intermingle with the coniferous forests, and, unlike their habit in the East, turn to a brilliant red and orange in the fall, presenting a landscape effect of indescribable beauty. The snows linger in the forests until July, and Alpine flowers grow right through the snow and in close proximity thereto, so that almost anywhere near timber line one can pick up snow with one hand and beautiful wild flowers with the other.

The fauna: More than 400 kinds of birds are found in the State, which number is exceeded by only one other State. Many of these breed in the Estes Park region, so that bird life is abundant. Mammals of many kinds abound, such as chipmunks, squirrels, rabbits, conies, beaver; and there are some of the larger forms, such as mountain sheep, bear, lions, deer, coyotes, and wildcats.

Physiography: Glaciation, with its resultant cirques and moraines and impounded lakes, is in evidence everywhere. A half dozen small glaciers occur, and gorgeous and steep slopes are clad with perpetual snow. The rocks are chiefly granitics, schists, and quartzites, though eruptive rocks are also found within the park. Specimen Mountain, an old volcanic cone and crater, has vast deposits of black obsidian (volcanic glass) and geodes.

The proposed national park includes about 10 miles of the Great Continental Divide, with Longs Peak nearly 3 miles (14,253 feet) above the ocean tides. A dozen other peaks exceed 13,000 feet, and a score rise to 12,000 feet. Scenically it is America's gem, a wonderland of such transcendent beauty that the tourist is sure to return many times.

There are scores of unscaled peaks and dizzy heights to tempt the most arduous mountain climber. It would take one many summers to explore all the canyons, high peaks, and lakes and waterfalls.

Prof. Bethel has also compiled some interesting information upon the peaks of Colorado, as follows:

THE HIGH PEAKS OF COLORADO.

[Being a list gathered from the latest available authorities of the named mountain summits in this State exceeding 14,000 feet in altitude. Compiled for the club by Ellsworth Bethel.]

Colorado is the mountain State of the Union. Of the 49 named peaks of the United States which exceed 14,000 feet in height, Colorado has 36, California 12, and there is 1 in Washington. There are probably at least 10 more peaks of this altitude in Colorado which remain unnamed. It is estimated that one-fifth of the State stands above 10,000 feet in altitude, that it contains 350 peaks above 11,000 feet, 220 above 12,000 feet, 150 above 13,000 feet, and about 45 above 14,000 feet.

The highest peak in the United States proper is Mount Whitney (Cal.), altitude 14,501 feet. Mount Massive, Mount Elbert, and Blanca Peak, which head the table in this leaflet, are, respectively, the second, third, and fourth highest in the United States. Massive and Elbert, after elaborate recent surveys, have been found to differ less than a foot in altitude.

In the following table the first column gives the name of the mountain, the second column the altitude of the peak above sea level, the third column the survey or other authority from which the figure is derived, the fourth column the mountain range to which the peak belongs, and the fifth the county in which it lies. In the fourth column the letters "U. S. G. S." signify that the figure given is fixed by the records of the United States Geological Survey; Hayden, that it is derived from the Hayden survey of Colorado; Wheeler, from the Wheeler survey; and C. A. C. from work done by Prof. L. G. Carpenter and students of the Colorado Agricultural College. Pikes Peak and Longs Peak were determined by checked spirit leveling, and are probably correct within 1 foot. Those credited to the United States Geological Survey were determined by vertical angulation, and are probably correct within 10 feet; while those credited to Hayden and Wheeler were determined many years ago by mercurial barometer, and may be in error as much as 100 feet.

The altitudes of Mount Massive and Mount Elbert were recently determined by vertical angulation by R. B. Marshall, chief geographer of the United States Geological Survey, for the Colorado Academy of Sciences, upon request of its secretary, Mr. J. Clarence Hersey.

Recent determinations have reduced the elevations of Mount of the Holy Cross and Buckskin Mountain so that they no longer belong in this list. The name Crestone supplants Three Tetons, and Mount Wilson has been adopted in place of Glacier Mountain.

Grays Peak, Torreys Peak, Mount Evans, Longs Peak, and Pikes Peak are visible from Denver, and the last named also from Pueblo and Colorado Springs.

Hon. Mark Daniels, general superintendent and landscape engineer of national parks, has furnished me with some data upon this subject that I feel is of sufficient general importance to warrant being inserted in the RECORD in connection with this bill. His letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 11, 1915.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. TAYLOR: Your request for a more full opinion from me as to my reasons for advocating the creation of the Rocky Mountain National Park brings up a rather broad subject, and one which in order to be entered into exhaustively would take considerable time and space.

It seems to me that the question of our national parks, like other subjects involving art and esthetics, is constantly being confronted with a demand for reasons for its existence, and yet to one who understands the functions which they perform in the scheme of things it seems impossible that they should be so frequently challenged.

That scenery is a national asset has been proven in many instances in the older countries, where all resources have been carefully considered. Switzerland derives a revenue of over $250,000,000 annually from her scenery. She has made the scenic resources of her country one of the best revenue producers within her boundaries.

It has been estimated that over $400,000,000 annually leave this country and are spent abroad by tourists and travelers. Undoubtedly a very large proportion of this is for the purpose of transacting business, and to acquaint the traveler with the customs of the foreign people; a very large proportion, however, is spent by the tourist who goes to see scenery, and so spending his money he is purchasing a commodity which is inferior to the home product.

If the Secretary of the Interior were to announce to the press that a new mineral product had been discovered which would produce to this country, after being thoroughly developed, $50,000,000 net annually for a period of 25 years, there would undoubtedly be a great hue and cry to undertake the enterprise at once, and yet, if the national park system were properly developed and placed before the public in all of its wonderful phases there is no doubt that more than $50,000,000 that are spent annually abroad by scenery lovers would be diverted and be spent within the boundaries of the United States.

In order that the people of this country shall derive the benefit, from a commercial point of view, of our national scenery, it is necessary that the scenic areas of national interest be set aside and administered in a way that will satisfy the demands of the tourist and the traveling public. This is the real and fundamental reason why it is necessary, in order to develop scenery as a national resource, to set aside the scenic areas as national parks.

As to the administrative cost or the cost of maintenance and development of these parks there are two general policies which have been adopted by different countries, namely, the establishment and administration of the parks upon the principle that they should be free to all visitors as against the policy of developing along the lines of self-support. I may say that it is only in the older countries, with the exception of the Dominion of Canada, where such parks are administered as free institutions. There is much to be said in favor of both policies, but suffice it to say that the policy which has developed in this country is one of administering the parks as nearly as possible in such a way as to make them self-supporting.

This can be done by charging hotel concessioners, transportation concessioners, etc., a rental for the privilege of operating their concessions in the park areas. The Secretary of the Interior has recently taken steps to accomplish as economic administration as possible and to develop the revenue-producing phases of the parks in a manner that will in no wise interfere with their scenic values.

We have, therefore, the following condition: The scenery of our country is a great national resource and once through which many millions of dollars annually may be kept in this country which are now being spent outside. The policy which looks to the eventual establishment of these reservations upon a self-supporting basis, so that the cost of maintaining the parks as a national resource will be of little or no expense to the Federal Government. It is difficult to understand, therefore, any reticence on the part of Congress to set aside any area which has proven itself to be one of national interest and one of such magnitude and glorious scenery as to attract, without assistance on the part of the Federal Government, such numbers as 56,000 visitors, which, I am told, was the number that visited the proposed Rocky Mountain National Park last year.

Cordially, yours,

MARK DANIELS,
General Superintendent and Landscape Engineer,
National Parks.

Mr. Marshall in his report to which I have referred concludes his statement and recommendations concerning the park as follows:

PHYSICAL CHARACTERISTICS.

There is no predominant, commanding natural feature in Estes Park, such as is found in the Crater Lake, the Yellowstone, or the Yosemite, or along the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, but the region as a whole is as beautiful as any to be found in the United States, or, indeed in the world. There is spread before the eye a gorgeous assemblage of wonderful mountain sculpture, surrounded by fantastic and ever-changing clouds, suspended in an apparently atomless space. At first view, as one beholds the scene in awe and amazement, the effect is as of an enormous painting, a vast panorama stretching away for illimitable distances; gradually, this idea of distance disappears, the magnificent work of nature seems to draw nearer and nearer, reduced apparently by an unseen microscope to the refinement of a delicate cameo. Each view becomes a refined miniature, framed by another more fascinating, the whole presenting an impressive picture, never to be forgotten.

ACCESSIBILITY.

Perhaps the most attractive feature of the plan to create this park, viewed from both the National and the State standpoints, is the accessibility of the area. In considering the probable success of this proposed park, I have kept constantly in mind the enormous population of the eastern part of the United States, which would derive benefit from it, its nearness to the large centers of population, and the low transportation charges in effect during the season in which it would be most visited. Estes Park can be reached from Chicago in about 30 hours and from Denver by automobile in about 3 hours. These factors will lead to a large amount of travel into the park from outside the State and undoubtedly will result in its assuming a much more national character than any of the existing parks. Denver being the center of practically all the railroad systems west of Mississippi River, the number of visitors that may be expected annually in the proposed park will add enormous revenues to the State of Colorado and will make this one of its most productive sections.

There has been a marked increase within the last few years in the annual number of visitors to Estes Park and vicinity. It is estimated that this number has increased from 1,800 to 30,000 within a comparatively short time and, with the added attraction of the national park, it seems safe to predict that within a decade or two 100,000 or more people from all sections of the United States will visit this area each year. From a purely commercial standpoint, then, the proposed national park should certainly appeal to the people of the State of Colorado. Moreover, every citizen of Colorado realizes full well the value of the entire State as a health resort, and, reputed for their hospitality as they are, I am sure that none of them would wish, from selfish motives, to prevent the enjoyment of the benefits of his State by the greatest number of people of the whole country; but the State does need the help of the National Government in this, and I know of no way in which this assistance can be better rendered than in the establishment and maintenance of a national park. There is even now in the Estes Park one good hotel, the Stanley, which probably cost in the neighborhood of $500,000, and numerous smaller ones, which seem to indicate clearly the confidence of the public in the permanency of the attractions of this mountain park.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

I therefore respectfully recommend—

(1) That Congress be asked to create for the benefit and enjoyment of the people a national park in the Rocky Mountains of Colorado in the vicinity of Longs Peak, to be known as the "Rocky Mountain National Park," with boundary as defined on the map accompanying this report;

(2) That wherever practicable lands included within the boundary of the proposed park which are now in private ownership be exchanged for public lands outside said boundary;

(3) That a civilian superintendent and necessary guards be appointed through the United States civil service for the proper administration of the park;

(4) That leases of suitable acreage for the erection of hotels and camps for the accommodation of visitors within the park and of 1-acre tracts for the erection of private homes be granted, all such leases to cover periods of not more than 25 years, subject to renewal under conditions governing leases in the other national parks;

(5) That the use of dead and down timber for building purposes within the park be permitted;

(6) That suitable roads and trails be constructed within the park;

(7) That the use of automobiles within the park be permitted;

(8) That leases be granted, under suitable conditions, for the development of mining, hydroelectric, and grazing privileges within the park;

(9) That a fish hatchery be maintained within the park to keep the streams stocked with fish;

(10) That the destruction of game or birds within the park be prohibited; and

(11) That all revenues derived from the park, from whatever source, be applied to its development and improvement.

Very respectfully,

R. B. MARSHALL, Chief Geographer.

The present Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Franklin K. Lane, is one of the most earnest and forcible advocates of public parks in this country. A statement of his appearing in the Washington Evening Star a few days ago is exceedingly timely and interesting, as follows:

PREPARING FOR TOURIST TRAVEL.

Secretary Franklin K. Lane is a believer in preparedness. The Secretary of the Department of the Interior naturally leaves to his associates in the Cabinet, Secretaries Garrison and Daniels, the study of preparedness related to war equipment. What he is interested in is the preparedness on the part of the Government to handle properly the tremendous tourist travel in America, which is expected to be one of the results of the great war.

In the opinion of the Interior Department officials and others who are familiar with conditions in the national parks of the West these great natural show places have never been visited by as many American people as should have toured them, because there have not been the same kind of facilities to care for travelers which are found in Europe, where the tourist trade has been catered to for hundreds of years, and where in many places it is the chief source of income of the people.

Secretary Lane believes that many thousands of Americans will travel in this country during the coming season and following years who have heretofore spent their money in Europe, and that the national parks of the West and points in Alaska, with their scenic wonders, will be the places sought out by large numbers of American tourists. The work of reorganizing the system of caring for and developing the national parks is now going on, and in the near future it is believed that most of the American parks will have facilities which will rival Europe for completeness in providing for tourists.

Mark Daniels, the California landscape engineer, whom Secretary Lane has secured as the new general superintendent of the national parks, is now working on plans for reorganizing the system of management and bettering conditions generally in all of the great Government reservations which are under the Department of the Interior. Mr. Daniels is now planning along two lines, one to develop an economic policy for the parks and a system of administration to provide for the constant increase of visitors and an increase of revenue of the parks; and, secondly, to develop a system to care for the physical features of the parks, such as the construction of roads, trails, and buildings used by the hotel men and others who have concessions.

At the present time the Government appropriates slightly more than $300,000 to care for the national parks of the country. Canada appropriated $700,000 this year for her parks. The amount of revenue collected from national parks in the United States is approximately $100,000 a year. Revenue comes from three sources, rental and leasing of concessions, the operation of public utilities, and from natural resources, such as dead and down timber and water power.

Supt. Daniels believes that the revenues of the parks can be increased very materially without any great increase in the cost of operation, and that the national parks of the country in time can be made entirely self-sustaining. This condition will be brought about not by commercializing the parks any more than they ever have been in the past, but by increasing and perfecting facilities and conditions for caring for the tourists and encouraging a greatly increased tourist travel throughout all the reservations.

The new general superintendent of the parks thinks that the American people have been too slow to look upon scenery as an asset which is just as valuable in its way as is coal, timber, water power, or any other natural resource. The scenery of Switzerland is estimated to be worth more than $250,000,000 a year to the people of that little country. It has also been estimated that the Americans who go abroad each year carry to the various European countries more than $400,000,000.

One of the features in increasing accommodations for the parks is the proposed establishment in each park of a bureau of information and transportation. At the present time visitors have fallen into the habit of going to the nearest concession stand to ask for information, and, naturally, the advice is governed by the financial interest of the concessionaire.

Another feature in the development of the park system will be the organization of a national park ranger service. This will include the building up of a force of able men who will be uniformed, and, as representatives of the Government, will set a new standard of service in America in providing for every care of tourists who are Uncle Sam's guests in the parks. The plans for organization of the ranger service are now being developed by Col. L. M. Brett, the United States Army officer who is superintendent of the Yellowstone National Park, and who has just been detailed to Washington especially to cooperate with Supt. Daniels in perfecting plans for the organization of this service.

Concerning the financial policy of the Government in relation to these parks, and as a matter of information, it may be stated that in the sundry civil act approved March 14, 1911 (33 Stat., 1421), provision is made that hereafter the Secretary of the Interior shall submit in the annual Book of Estimates, following the estimates for each of the national parks, a classified statement of receipts and expenditures for the complete fiscal year next preceding the fiscal year for which the estimates of appropriations are submitted. Pursuant to this statute, the data required have been embodied in succeeding Books of Estimates. (H. Doc. 129, 62d Cong., 2d sess., p. 412 et seq.; H. Doc. 944, 62d Cong., 3d sess., p. 638 et seq.; and H. Doc. 398, 63d Cong., 2d sess, p. 574 et seq.) In the Book of Estimates for 1916 (H. Doc. 1394, 63d Cong., 3d sess.) will be found detailed statements showing, as required by section 6 of the sundry civil act approved August 1, 1914, the number of persons employed, rates of compensation paid, and amounts expended for various purposes, with estimated unit cost of construction done or proposed to be done in the parks, showing amounts expended in 1914 and the purposes of the various items for which expenditure is to be incurred in 1916.

The report of the Secretary of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, just published, contains much interesting data on this subject, and I will ask to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting several extracts therefrom, as follows:

NATIONAL PARKS AND RESERVATIONS.

The policy of setting aside tracts of land as national parks or pleasure grounds for all the people was inaugurated by Congress with the establishment, by the act of March 1, 1872, of the Yellowstone National Park in Wyoming, Montana, and Idaho. Since that time 11 additional parks in various sections of the country have been created, embracing in all over 4,436,000 acres of land. The areas of these national parks, with date of establishment of each, are as follows:

Areas of national parks.

Name.	Date of establishment.	Area.
		Acres.
Yellowstone, in Wyoming, Montana, and Idaho	Mar. 1,1872	2,142,720
Yosemite, in California	Oct. 1,1890	719,622
Sequoia, in California	Sept. 25,1890	161,597
General Grant, in California	Oct. 1,1890	2,536
Mount Rainier, in Washington	Mar. 2,1899	207,360
Crater Lake, in Oregon	May 22,1902	159,360
Wind Cave, in South Dakota	Jan. 9,1903	10,522
Sullys Hill, in North Dakota	Apr. 27,1904	780
Platt, in Oklahoma	July 1,1902 Apr. 21,1904	848.22
Mesa Verde, in Colorado	June 29,1906 June 30,1913	48,966.40
Hot Springs Reservation, in Arkansas	June 16,1880	911.63
Glacier, in Montana	May 11,1910	981,681
Total		4,436,904.25

Visitors: The increasing number of visitors to these national reservations and the many requests that are received for literature in relation thereto clearly indicate the interest of the public therein. The last national park was created May 11, 1910, and since that time bills have been introduced in Congress looking to the establishment of additional national parks in various sections of the country, none of which has as yet become a law. During the year the total number of visitors in all the parks aggregated 239,693, as against 251,703 during 1913. While the travel to these parks was not as great as in 1913, there is every reason to believe that there will be a material increase in the number of visitors during the next fiscal year, when the Panama-Pacific International Exposition will be held in San Francisco.

Economic value of national parks: Without taking into consideration the cost to visitors of transportation from their homes to the parks, a fair idea of the economic value of tourist travel in four of the larger parks may be obtained by consideration of the financial reports of concessionaires, to wit, the gross receipts in the Yellowstone for 1913 amounted to $1,186.811.36, as compared with $1,067,161.34 for 1912; in the Yosemite, $359,481.45 for 1913, as compared with $311,444.32 for 1912; in the Mount Rainier, $66,942.76 for 1913, as against $56,735.93 for 1912; and in the Glacier National Park, $161,510.87 for 1913.

Appropriations and revenues: The total appropriations made by Congress for protection and improvement of these parks during the year, expendable under this department, was $302,490, and the total revenues received from concessionaires in all the parks was $56,949.01.

Expenditures of revenues: The several acts of Congress setting aside lands for national park purposes, except in the cases of the Crater Lake National Park, Oreg., and the Mesa Verde National Park, Colo., authorize the expenditure of the revenues derived from the privileges or concessions therein in the management and protection of the respective reservations. In the case of the two parks above mentioned, however, the revenues therefrom are under existing law deposited in the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts and the reservations receive no direct benefit therefrom. It is desirable that these parks, so far as the revenues therefrom are concerned, be put upon the same footing as are other national parks, and in submitting the annual estimates to Congress for the park service appropriate legislation has been recommended.

Senate bill 2223, to authorize the use of the revenues in the Crater Lake National Park in the management of the same and the construction, repair, and improvement of roads, trails, and bridges therein, passed the Senate April 14, 1914, and is now pending before the House Committee on the Public Lands. This bill should be enacted into law at an early date.

Automobiles in the parks: Automobiles have heretofore been admitted, under strict regulations governing travel of the roads, in the Mount Rainier National Park, the Crater Lake National Park, the Glacier National Park, the Wind Cave National Park, the Platt National Park, the General Grant National Park, over the Giant Forest Road in the Sequoia National Park, over the Coulterville Road from the Merced Grove of Big Trees into the Yosemite Valley in the Yosemite National Park, and over a road in the northwestern section of the Yellowstone National Park not forming a part of the generally traveled routes in that reservation, for the special accommodation of people of Gallatin County, Mont.

During the year automobiles, under appropriate regulations, were admitted over the roads in the Mesa Verde National Park, Colo., and were also admitted on the Wawona Road leading to the Mariposa Big Tree Grove and the Big Oak Flat Road in the Yosemite National Park. The generally traveled roads in the Yellowstone National Park, Mont., and the Hot Springs Reservation, Ark., are not in such a condition, considering the safety of individuals and animals, as to permit of their joint use by motor-driven vehicles and vehicles drawn by horses. Licenses have been issued during 1914, as follows:

Automobile licenses issued, season of 1914.

	Automobiles.	Motor cycles.
Mount Rainier	1,594	188
Crater Lake	1,107	18
Glacier	267	4
Sequoia	158	----------
General Grant	392	12
Yosemite	673	----------
Wind Cave	11	----------
Mesa Verde	34	4

The policy of the department in admitting automobiles to the parks, where road conditions make motoring safe, has met with general approval. It enables the traveling public to make trips to the parks more expeditiously than formerly, and in addition to materially increasing the number of visitors to the reservation has been productive of considerable revenues, the receipts from this source in 1914 being $14.243.07 as against $8,435.45 during 1913.

Jurisdiction: In the Yellowstone National Park and the Platt National Park the United States has exclusive jurisdiction thereover, and Congress has provided a means of enforcement of the laws and regulations pertaining thereto. The Legislature of the State of Montana, by the act of February 17, 1911, ceded exclusive jurisdiction to the United States of the territory within the metes and bounds of the Glacier National Park, and by act approved August 22, 1914, Congress accepted the cession by the State of Montana of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Glacier National Park, and the United States District Court for the District of Montana has, as required by section 6 of said act, appointed a commissioner to reside in the park, who has jurisdiction to hear and act upon all complaints made of any violations of law or of the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Interior for the government of the park and for the protection of the animals, birds, and fish, and objects of interest therein, and for other purposes authorized by said act. In the other national parks, however, over which the laws of the States in which they are located obtain, great difficulties in administration have been encountered, owing to the fact that the department has no jurisdiction to punish offenses in violation of the regulations relating thereto, and particularly in the matter of preventing depredations on game and the selling of liquor therein.

Removal of troops from the parks: Under the act of June 6, 1900 (31 Stat., 618), the Secretary of War has, on request of this department, detailed troops during the summer months to the Yosemite, Sequoia, and General Grant National Parks for protective purposes therein. The expense to the War Department in maintaining these details was considerable, and the expenditures from the park revenues resulting from their presence in the park were large; furthermore, the conditions in and around these reservations which led to the authorization of the use of the military force in these parks having radically changed, the conclusion was reached that their presence was no longer required in the Yosemite, Sequoia, and General Grant National Parks, and the Secretary of War was so advised. During the past year, therefore, troops have no longer been employed in these reservations and have been superseded by civilian rangers, bringing the latter in closer touch with the actual work of the park management than was formerly practicable when troops were only in the reservations for a few months.

General superintendent of national parks: On March 10, 1914, Mr. Mark Daniels, of California, was commissioned as landscape engineer in the Yosemite National Park for the purpose of preparing a comprehensive general plan for the development and improvement of the floor of the Yosemite Valley covering the best locations for roads, trails, and bridges, so as to bring into view the full scenic beauty of the surroundings, the clearing and trimming of suitable areas of woods to provide attractive vistas, the proper location and arrangement of a village in the Yosemite Valley, etc. Subsequently, with a view to increasing the efficiency in the administration of the parks and the reduction in the cost of superintendence, Mr. Daniels was commissioned, on June 4, 1914, general superintendent and landscape engineer for all the national parks under this department, and the titles of the officers in charge of the immediate work in the reservations changed from superintendents to supervisors at lower salaries than were paid the superintendents. Since the date of his appointment Mr. Daniels has inspected the Yosemite, Sequoia, and General Grant National Parks in California; Mount Rainier National Park, Wash.; Glacier National Park, Mont.; Crater Lake National Park, Oreg.; and the Yellowstone National Park, Wyo., and submitted recommendations in relation thereto; and before the close of the year he will inspect the Mesa Verde National Park, Colo.; Platt National Park, Okla.; Hot Springs Reservation, Ark.; the Wind Cave National Park, S. Dak.; and Sullys Hill National Park, N. Dak.

Roads: Under a cooperative agreement with the Good Roads Office of the Agricultural Department, and with a view to bringing about the wisest possible expenditure of available funds for road building and maintenance thereof in the parks, the services of experienced highway engineers have been secured to make comprehensive surveys for a system of roads and trails in the reservations, the salaries of such engineers to be paid by the Agricultural Department and their expenses by the Interior Department. This work is satisfactorily progressing and preliminary surveys have been made in the Glacier, Yosemite, Sequoia, and General Grant National Parks. Through cooperation by the employees of the Forest Service in the field with the employees in the various parks, more effective control of forest fires have been secured and much valuable timber has been preserved.

Sanitary inspections: The reports of the sanitary inspections heretofore made by the chemist of the United States Geological Survey of camp, hotel, sewerage, and other conditions of the Glacier, Yellowstone, and Yosemite National Parks were brought to the attention of the superintendents of these reservations as well as the concessionaires therein, and active work has been inaugurated looking to the protection from pollution of the water for drinking purposes, the proper disposition of sewage, and the enforcement of hygienic regulations necessary to the protection of the health of the visitors in the parks. Similar inspections will be made where necessary in other national parks as funds available for the work will permit.

Hotels: In the Yellowstone National Park the hotel at Mammoth Hot Springs has been reconstructed, additions have been made to the Old Faithful Hotel, the pavilions for housing and caring for people at the permanent camps materially improved, and a 20 per cent reduction in the transportation rates from the western entrance of the park has been secured without any deterioration of the character of service rendered. In the Yosemite National Park a contract is under consideration under which new hotel and camps will be provided for the accommodation of tourists in the Yosemite Valley, and in the other parks material improvements have been made in the permanent camps and other services.

Hetch Hetchy Valley, Yosemite National Park: In prior annual reports the permit issued to the city and county of San Francisco in 1908 granting the right of way over certain lands in the Yosemite National Park, with permission to take water from Lake Eleanor and Hetch Hetchy Valley in that park under conditions therein set forth, was very fully discussed, and reference was made to a bill then pending in Congress granting the city and county of San Francisco such right of way in said park. On December 19, 1913, House bill 7207 became a law, granting to the city and county of San Francisco certain rights of way in, over, and through certain public lands, the Yosemite National Park, and Stanislaus National Forest, and certain lands in the Yosemite National Park, the Stanislaus National Forest, and the public lands in the State of California, and for other purposes. The maps required under this act showing the right of way have been filed and approved and the city has taken steps to effectuate the provisions of this statute.

Proposed national-park service: In the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior for 1911, in discussing national-park affairs, he stated:

"While public interest in and use of these reservations is steadily increasing, as shown by the growing number of visitors, adequate provision has not been made for their efficient administration, and sufficient appropriations have not been made for their proper care and development. At present each of these parks is a separate and distinct unit for administrative purposes. The only general supervision which is possible is that obtained by referring matters relating to the national parks to the same officials in the office of the Secretary of the Interior. Separate appropriations are made for each park, and the employment of a common supervising and directing force is impossible. Many of the problems in park management are the same throughout all of the national parks, and a great gain would be obtained and substantial economies could be effected if the national parks and reservations were grouped together under a single administrative bureau. Bills to create a bureau of national parks have heretofore been introduced in Congress, and, in my judgment, they should immediately receive careful consideration so that proper legislation for this purpose may be enacted. Adequate appropriation should also be made for the development of these pleasure grounds of the people, especially through the construction of roads and trails and their proper care and maintenance."

A bill (S. 826, 63d Cong., 1st sess.) to establish the national-park service, and for other purposes, is now pending in Congress and has been reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Public Lands, and its early enactment into law is earnestly recommended.

There are hereto appended tables giving the location, date of establishment, area, private holdings, if any, and number of visitors, and the special characteristics of the various national parks under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, the appropriations made by Congress for the protection and improvement thereof during 1914 and eight years prior thereto, as well as revenues derived from leases, privileges, and concessions in said reservation received during said period; also a statement of the automobile receipts during 1914.

NATIONAL MONUMENTS AND PRESERVATION OF AMERICAN ANTIQUITIES.

By an act approved June 8, 1906, entitled "An act for the preservation of American antiquities," the President of the United States is authorized, "in his discretion, to declare by public proclamation historic landmarks, historic and prehistoric structures, and other objects of historic or scientific interest that are situated upon the lands owned or controlled by the Government of the United States to be national monuments." Under such authority the President has created the 29 monuments:

National monuments administered by Interior Department.

[1] Estimated area.
[2] Donated to the United States.
[3] Originally set aside by proclamation of Apr. 16, 1908, and contained only 120 acres.
[4] Within an Indian reservation.

One new monument, the Papago Saguare, was created during the fiscal year. It embraces approximately 2,050 acres of rocky and desert land in Maricopa County, Ariz. Within the tract is found a splendid collection of characteristic desert flora, including many striking examples of giant cactus and other interesting species of cacti as well as fine examples of the yucca palm. Within the tract historic pictographs may be found upon the faces of the rocks, adding to the interest of the reservation ethnologically and archeologically.

Administrative conditions: The supervision of these various monuments has, in the absence of any specific appropriation for their protection and improvement, necessarily been intrusted to the field officers of the department having charge of the territory in which the several monuments are located.

As stated in the last annual report, the administrative conditions continue to be unsatisfactory, since no appropriation of funds has yet been made available for this important, protective, and preservative work. Such supervision as has been possible in the cases of a few monuments only has been wholly inadequate and has not prevented vandalism, unauthorized exploitation or spoliation of relics found in those prehistoric ruins, whose preservation is contemplated by the passage of the act of June 8, 1906. An estimate in the sum of $5,000 for protection of these monuments was submitted last year, but no appropriation was made, and a similar estimate will again be submitted to Congress, not so much for the purpose of preserving by restoration the objects reserved in the national monuments as to prevent the removal of valuable relics and vandalism. Monuments suffering from these causes should be provided with a custodian or superintendent, and in this way a small general appropriation can be made most useful and its expenditure will be wholly in the interest of the public. The protection and preservation of the national monuments as public reservations are of great interest and importance, because a great variety of objects, historic, prehistoric, and scientific in character are thus preserved for public use intact instead of being exploited by private individuals for gain and their treasures scattered. These reserves should be administered in connection with the national parks, which they strongly resemble. It would be difficult to define one in terms that would exclude the other. The renewal of the estimate for a small appropriation has been made for the purpose of keeping this class of reserves intact until such time as Congress shall authorize the creation of some administrative unit which shall take over both the parks and monuments and administer them under a general appropriation.

National monuments under other departments: The following national monuments are not administered by the Secretary of the Interior:

Excavation of ruins: Paragraph 3 of the uniform rules and regulations promulgated by the Secretaries of the Interior, Agriculture, and War under date of December 28, 1906, to carry out the provisions of the act for the preservation of American antiquities, reads as follows:

"Permits for the excavation of ruins, the excavation of archæological sites, and the gathering of objects of antiquity will be granted by the respective Secretaries having jurisdiction to reputable museums, universities, colleges, or other recognized scientific or educational institutions, or to their duly authorized agents."

During the year five permits were granted for the examination, excavation, and gathering of specimens, as follows:

To Prof. Byron Cummings, of the University of Utah, to make examinations and excavations as continuation of explorations under similar permits granted him by the department on June 26, 1912, and July 11, 1913, with the Navajo National Monument, in the Navajo and Piute Indian Reservations, and in San Juan County, Utah, as well as on lands 30 miles northwest of Bluff, Utah.

To Prof. F. W. Putnam, honorary director of the Peabody Museum, Harvard University, to make examination and excavation of ruins in the Chinlee Valley and the tributary canyons heading against the Navajo Mountains, on its east and north sides, on behalf of the Peabody Museum, as continuation of explorations under a similar permit granted by the department on June 18, 1913. This locality is in the vicinity of the Navajo National Monument, and approaches, but does not overlap, the region of Prof. Cummings's explorations.

To Prof. Lull, representing the department of geology, of Yale University, to enter upon the Rosebud Indian Reservation and the Pine Ridge Reservation, in South Dakota, and the Fort Niobrara Abandoned Military Reservation, in Nebraska, for the purpose of collecting vertebrate fossils, specimens of which are to be used in the museums of Yale University.

To Prof. Livingston Farrand, president of the University of Colorado, to carry on archæological research in Montezuma and La Plata Counties, Colo., and in San Juan County, N. Mex., including such parts of the Ute and Navajo Indian Reservations as lie within those counties, and to take specimens for the benefit of the University of Colorado.

To Dr. E. Bonnert, of Dornach-Mulhausen, Germany, for removal of not exceeding 500 pounds of silicified wood from the Petrified Forest National Monument in Arizona, for presentation to the Geological Institute of Elsass-Lothringen, in Germany.

BIRD RESERVES.

All of the bird reserves have been created through reference from the Interior Department to the President of forms of Executive orders providing therefor. These reserves are regarded as in all essential particulars reservations of public lands for public use or other purposes, for which there are numerous precedents. The first specific act of Congress providing for the protection of birds by bird reserves created by Executive order was introduced by Hon. John F. Lacy, of Iowa, and became a law on June 28, 1906 (34 Stat., 536). This act made it unlawful to kill birds, to take their eggs, or to willfully disturb birds upon the reservations, and it provides a fine of not exceeding $500 or imprisonment for not exceeding six months, or both fine and imprisonment, for each conviction secured. This law was substantially reenacted in the new penal code approved March 4, 1909 (35 Stat., 1104), in the following language:

"SEC. 84. Whoever shall hunt, capture, willfully disturb, or kill any bird of any kind whatever, or take the eggs of any such bird, on any lands of the United States which have been set apart or reserved as breeding grounds for birds by any law, proclamation, or Executive order, except under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time prescribe, shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both."

During the year two new reservations for the protection of native birds were created, as follows:

Smith Island, Wash., created June 6, 1914.

Blackbeard Island, Ga., created July 17, 1914.

The reservations now existing are 67 in number, of which 65 are being administered under the direction of the Biological Survey, Department of Agriculture. The Pribilof Reservation, in Alaska, is administered by the Bureau of Fisheries of the Department of Commerce, and the Canal Zone Reservation, Panama, by the Isthmian Canal Commission.

[3] Under jurisdiction of Isthmian Canal Commission, Canal Zone. Strictly speaking, not a bird reservation, but birds are protected by Executive order.

Total reservations, including Canal Zone, 67.

Bird reserves enlarged and reduced.

Name of reservation.	Date.	Location.	Area.
Pelican Island	Jan. 26, 1909	Florida (enlarged)	Unknown.
Mosquito Inlet	Apr. 2, 1909	do	Do.
Cold Springs	Nov. 25, 1911	Oregon (enlarged)	Do.
Clear Lake	Jan. 13, 1912	California (reduced)	Do.
Minidoka	Feb. 21, 1912	Idaho (enlarged)	Do.
Niobrara	Nov. 14, 1912	Nebraska (enlarged) [1]	15,253.7 acres.

As appears from this list, these reservations are scattered between Alaska and Porto Rico. After careful consideration, based upon representations made by this department, the Isthmian Canal Commission secured an Executive order for the protection of the native birds within the zone, which, in its punitive features, conforms to section 84 of the United States Penal Code. Jurisdiction over the Canal Zone reservation is, however, retained by the Isthmian Canal Commission instead of being placed with the Department of Agriculture, as is the case in all other Government bird reserves.

SPECIAL CHARACTERISTICS.

(1) Wonderful scenery, geysers, boiling springs, mud volcanoes and springs, mountains, grand waterfalls, brilliant-hued canyons, great lake 8,000 feet above the level of the sea, wild animals.

(2) Mountain scenery, magnificent waterfalls, the Hetch Hetchy and Yosemite Valley, ice-sculptured canyons, glacier lakes, forests.

(3) The home of the "big tree" (sequoia gigantea), growing to a height of 300 feet, with a diameter of 30 feet, the bark being 2 feet thick; rugged and picturesque scenery, beautiful cascades and falls, and wonderful caves.

(4) Glaciers and wild mountain scenery.

(5) Rugged mountain scenery, beautiful lake within the crater of an extinct volcano, etc.

(6) Well known by reason of a cavern therein having many miles of galleries and numerous chambers of considerable size containing many peculiar formations.

(7) Noted for its bromide and other springs, the waters of which have medicinal qualities; park well wooded, scenery picturesque.

(8) Set aside to preserve the prehistoric ruins of an ancient people; rugged scenery.

(9) Famous for its thermal springs, having wonderful medicinal qualities.

(10) Famed for its beautiful lakes derived from glaciers, lofty mountains clad with forests, magnificent glacial formations, numberless waterfalls. Game, fish, and birds abound.

(11) Small rugged hills containing prehistoric ruins. Practically a local park.

(12) These ruins are one of the most noteworthy relics of a prehistoric age and people within the limits of the United States. Discovered in ruinous condition in 1694.

All of the Presidents of the United States and all of the Secretaries of the Interior have for several years past been enthusiastically in favor of the establishment of national parks and the development of the national-park service in order that our country and our people may obtain some of the benefits of our unparalleled scenery and climate, and so the visitors and tourists from the world at large, as well as from the various States, may be accommodated and suitably cared for in their visits to our public playgrounds and outdoor recreation centers.

President Taft in his message to Congress on February 2, 1912, in advocacy of the establishment of a bureau of national parks, used the following language:

I earnestly recommend the establishment of a bureau of national parks. Such legislation is essential to the proper management of those wondrous manifestations of nature, so startling and so beautiful that everyone recognizes the obligations of the Government to preserve them for the edification and recreation of all the people.

The Yellowstone Park, the Yosemite, the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, the Glacier National Park, and the Mount Rainier National Park and others furnish appropriate instances. In only one case have we made anything like adequate preparation for the use of a park by the public. That case is the Yellowstone National Park. Every consideration of patriotism and the love of nature and of beauty and of art requires us to expend money enough to bring all these natural wonders within easy reach of our people. The first step in that direction is the establishment of a responsible bureau, which shall take upon itself the burden of supervising the parks and of making recommendations as to the best method of improving their accessibility and usefulness.

Soon thereafter President Taft delivered an address upon the subject, from which the following extracts may be appropriately quoted:

PRESIDENT TAFT'S ADDRESS.

Ladies and gentlemen: It costs a good deal of money to run a government, and the first ambition of anyone responsible for a government is economy—at least it ought to be. Therefore the proposition to add a bureau or a department sends goose flesh all over the body of anyone who has any sort of responsibility in respect to the finances of the Government, for it means another nucleus for the increase of governmental expenses. Yet a modern government, in order to be what it ought to be, must spend money. Utility involves expense.

Now, we have in the United States a great many natural wonders, and in that lazy way we have in our Government of first taking up one thing and then another, we have set aside a number of national parks, of forest reservations, covering what ought to be national parks, and what are called national monuments. We have said to ourselves: "Those can not get away. We have surrounded them by a law which makes them necessarily Government property forever, and we will wait in our own good time to make them useful as parks to the people of the country. Since the Interior Department is the 'lumber room' of the Government, into which we put everything that we don't know how to classify and don't know what to do with, we will just put them under the Secretary of the Interior." That is the condition of the national parks to-day.

Those of you who have first been in the Yellowstone Park and admired its beauties and thought of the ability of the Army engineers to construct such roads as are there, and then have gone on to the Yosemite and have seen its beauties and have found the roads not quite so good, and then have gone to Grand Canyon and have found a place where you could bury the Yellowstone Canyon and the Yosemite and never know that they were there, and found no roads at all except a railroad, that was built at a great expense and probably at great loss, to the side of the canyon, and only a trail, called the "Bright Angel Trail," down into the canyon—down which they would not let me go, because they were afraid the mules could not carry me—you will understand that something needs to be done in respect to those parks if we are all to enjoy them.

I am in favor of equality of opportunity, and I resent an exclusion from the enjoyment of the wonders of the world that it only needs a little money to remove.

Now, the course that was taken in respect to the Yellowstone Park ought to be taken in respect to all of our parks. If we are going to have national parks, we ought to make them available to the people, and we ought to build the roads, as expensive as they may be, in order that those parks may become what they are intended to be when Congress creates them. And we can not do that, we can not carry them on effectively unless we have a bureau which is itself distinctly charged with the responsibility for their management and their building up.

When the Secretary of the Interior, therefore, asked me to come here and told me the subject of the meeting to-night, I was glad to come. It is going to add to the expense of the Interior Department, and it is going to swell those estimates, but it is essential that we should use what the Lord has given us in this way and make it available for the people. We have the money. It is not going to take enough to exhaust the Treasury. It is a proper expense, a necessary expense. Let us have the bureau.

The Hon. Walter L. Fisher, Secretary of the Interior during the last administration, made many eloquent and earnest appeals to Congress for suitable recognition and development of the national parks and for the establishment of a park service. In one of his addresses he used the following language:

ADDRESS OF HON. WALTER L. FISHER, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

In the first place, the national parks, like Topsy, have "just growed"; at least that is the impression which has been produced upon my mind from such investigation and discussion as I have given to them. There is no consistent theory of legislation with regard to the national parks. While some of them follow the general lines of previous statutes, there are wide variations in the statutory authority under which the parks are carried on to-day. The whole park work of some States is wholly different from that of others, and the situation in detail is almost radically divergent. For instance, I find some such question as this: Whether the revenue derived from a particular national park shall be available for the use of that park, its improvement and development. We have no consistent action. Two of our important parks are without statutory authority to that effect, so that such revenue as is derived from the park itself in any way has to go back into the general fund of the Nation, to be used in such a way as that derived from any other general source is used, and appropriated directly and specifically for that purpose. In other parks a very large per cent of the money available is directly available without appropriation. The same thing is true with regard to appropriations which Congress gives to the parks. The importance and the political pressure which a particular park possesses bring to it appropriations larger than those which may be given to another. The result is that we have no consistent theory of park administration.

There are many questions which anyone could see at a glance are similar in all these parks. Take, for instance, the question of road making. We have practically the same problems in all of the parks with regard to road making, at least in a very considerable number of then. For instance, there may be three or four parks where these problems are so similar that the general specifications, the general principles that should be applied, are identical, but they may differ from another class of these parks.

Take many of the other questions that are raised in the parks. The whole question of the protection and the disposition of the trees, the concessions, how the hotel concessions shall be managed, what requirement shall be made of the hotel proprietors, what regulations shall be made with regard to the casual, ordinary visitor for his protection and so that he may receive the proper sort of service. These are very similar in all these parks, or, at all events, it is quite apparent that an examination into any given question in one of the parks would throw a great deal of light upon the same problem when it arises in other of the parks.

I mention these things, simple as they may seem, to call your attention to the singular fact that although there has been a great deal of talk of improved efficiency in our Government affairs, we have absolutely no machinery and no legal authority to use any machinery for the coordination of these parks, so we may state this problem as a whole. The only thing we can possibly do in the way of coordination in the Interior Department is to see that questions that come to us for determination are referred to the same individuals in the department. We can see that the chief clerk or his assistant shall primarily pass upon these matters. We may say that the assistant secretary—as distinguished from the first assistant, there being two—shall be the person to whom appeals shall go, the person to whom the chief clerk shall go for final determination of questions of importance; and we do. When we have done that we are through. We may use our Division of Mails and Files. We may use our Division of Publications and get a certain amount of effective work there; and we have Mr. Schmeckebier, of that division, who has accomplished some quite remarkable results, in my judgment, in the publicity line simply in getting out some material to those who are eager to have it. We have found that the American public is greedy for real news about the national parks; that it is genuinely interested in the national parks and ready to get anything that is not simply perfunctory news upon this subject. But when we have done these things the Department of the Interior is through. That is all that it can do toward coordination. It would seem that it required practically no argument to convince that the one thing we need at once for the efficiency of administration and economy in expenditure is to get these parks together under some division or bureau where they can receive the benefit of a central staff, where we can take the men who are now studying road making, or the management of roads, or the sprinkling problem, which is, after all, to the traveling public probably the most important question connected with the administration of the park, because the hotels will do a certain amount of looking after their own interests along the lines of intelligent and enlightened selfishness; and the revenue is there. But if the roads are to be sprinkled and taken care of, that must be done purely as a matter of expenditure, and unless it is looked after by the administrative force it will not be looked after at all.

Now, it is perfectly apparent what we ought to have. We ought to have some sort of a central organization—something in the nature of a bureau, with a head and subordinates—so we can get proper expert talent and men who will devote their time to the matters not merely with regard to one park, but all the parks where the question arises. It is perfectly apparent that if we were studying any one of these questions with regard to any one of these parks and were confined to that and the appropriations for that park we could not get as good a man to study these problems in the case of the others. And, in the second place, after we have done it once, unless we can utilize his advice and experience some place else, we don't get it at all. Then, another thing. We get rid of a good many of these isolated and separate and distinct appropriations. We would not have several appropriations made distinctly for the Yellowstone Park and made for the Yosemite Park, and so on down the line, and each appropriation confined to that particular or some particular function or interest in that park, but we would begin to learn that many of these problems are alike; that it is not enough to treat one park in one way and another in another way. We would have our bureau bring forward the things in our parks which now do not receive particular attention, very largely through ignorance of the subject, because the experience of the particular man who has that park in charge has not been so great as has been that of some other man.

The famous explorer and geologist, Dr. Hayden, in describing this wonderful scenic region as early as 1875, wrote:

Not only has nature amply supplied this region with features of great beauty and surroundings of admirable character, but it has thus distributed them that the eye of the artist may rest with perfect satisfaction on the complete picture presented.

Right Hon. James Bryce, British ambassador to the United States, in his address before the American Civic Association, November 20, 1912, among other things stated:

I have lived long enough in the United States and have known the United States long enough, having come here for the first time 42 years ago, to feel just as much interested in all those questions that relate to your welfare, in city and country, as if I were one of your citizens, and I hope you will allow me to speak to you with that freedom which you would allow to one of your citizens. I do not think I need to feel those limitations when discussing a subject of this kind, so far removed from politics or any other controversial fields.

Now, a word about additional parks. Although you have done splendidly in creating these I have mentioned and some others, there are still other places where national parks are wanted. * * * Then you might have some additional parks in Colorado also.

The places of scenic beauty do not increase, but, on the contrary, are in danger of being reduced in number and diminished in quantity, and the danger is always increasing with the accumulation of wealth, owing to the desire of private persons to appropriate these places. There is no better service we can render to the masses of the people than to set about and preserve for them wide spaces of fine scenery for their delight.

From these propositions I draw the conclusion that it is necessary to save what we have got and to extend the policy which you have wisely adopted by acquiring and preserving still further areas for the perpetual enjoyment of the people.

Mr. J. Horace McFarland, president of the American Civic Association, in an address to this society entitled "Are national parks worth while?" stated, among other things:

So I hold that in safeguarding and stimulating the essential virtue of patriotism the beauty of the American park stands forth as most of all worth while. I urge that as an antidote to the teachings of social disorder, as a counterirritant to the saloon, as a relentless foe to the slum, the American park idea in the playground is most completely justified.

* * * * * * *

The primary function of the national forests is to supply lumber. The primary function of the national parks is to maintain in healthful efficiency the lives of the people who must use that lumber. The forests are the Nation's reserve wood lots. The parks are the Nation's reserve for the maintenance of individual patriotism and Federal solidarity. The true ideal of their maintenance does not run parallel to the making of the most timber, or the most pasturage, or the most water power.

On another occasion Mr. McFarland also stated:

The value of great scenic possessions is being increasingly recognized the world over. Its value is now known to have great influence upon the development of that best citizenship, without which a country is poor, indeed.

LORD DUNRAVEN ON ESTES PARK.

No one ever has shown a higher appreciation of the attractiveness of Estes Park, which is an essential part of the proposed national park, than the Earl of Dunraven, an English peer, who has achieved an enviable reputation both as an author and a sportsman, and no one has had a better opportunity to form an opinion on the subject. In the early days, when Colorado still was a Territory and he was a young man, the earl was attracted there by the reports of the abundance of big game. He was among the first to enter the park, and he was so entranced by the beauties of the scenery and by the presence of elk, deer, mountain sheep, and other wild animals that he undertook to establish himself there permanently. He obtained possession of about 10,000 acres of land, including the greater part of the park, with the idea of establishing an immense game preserve and, incidentally, of entering into the cattle business upon a great scale. He took in a large number of stock and spent several years in the park, but, while he met with no obstacles in the beginning, increasing population ultimately had the effect of causing him to surrender control of this natural beauty spot, and he long since ceased to maintain his proprietary rights there. That, however, his interest did not cease with the cessation of his property tenure has been made manifest by his utterances on the subject. In one of his books, "The Great Divide," devoted in the main to an account of a camping trip through Yellowstone Park, and written as early as 1876, he makes many pleasant references to Estes Park, and in a recent work, entitled "Canadian Nights," he devotes an entire chapter to the Colorado park, which it is proposed now to transform into a national park. The chapter is entitled "A Colorado sketch," and it is so full of appreciation and withal so enlightening that I ask to have it inserted as a part of these hearings. The sketch is as follows:

A COLORADO SKETCH.

It would appear that the American Continent was originally of considerably larger dimensions than it is at present. It was probably found to be altogether too large for comfort or convenience, and it was reduced by the simple process of pressing or squeezing it together from the sides—an operation which caused it to crumple up toward the center, and produced that great, elevated, tumbled, and tossed region generally and vaguely known as the Rocky Mountains. If this simple theory of the formation of a continent sounds somewhat infantile, you must remember that I am not a scientific man, and that it is not more unscientific than many other theories of creation. There is no such thing as a chain of Rocky Mountains. Under that name are included various ranges and belts of mountains and hills, which embrace within their far stretching arms fertile valleys, arid deserts, sunny hill slopes clothed with valuable timber, parks full of pastoral beauty basking beneath a sun that warms them into semitropical life, but which never melts the virgin snow whitening the hoary heads of the mountains that forever look down upon those smiling scenes. Rich and extensive plains, tracts of inhabitable land almost large enough to be the cradle and home of nations, are included in the Rocky Mountains. Among all the States and Territories that lie wholly or partially within the borders of this vast, upheaved region there is none, so far as I am aware, more favored by nature and at the same time more accessible to man than Colorado. It is easily reached from all the great cities of the Eastern States; its scenery is varied, beautiful, grand, and even magnificent. Crystal streams of pure, wholesome water rush down the hillsides, play at hide and seek in the woods, and wander deviously through the parks. The climate is health-giving—unsurpassed, as I believe, anywhere—giving to the jaded spirit, the unstrung nerves, and weakened body a stimulant, a tone, and a vigor that can only be appreciated by those who have had the good fortune to travel or reside in that region.

The parks of Colorado constitute its special feature; there is nothing elsewhere on the American Continent resembling them in natural characteristics. They are not valleys; they are too flat and extensive for that. They can not be called plains, for they are not flat enough; and, besides, plains are generally bare and destitute of trees, while the parks are rich in timber, with beautifully undulating surfaces, broken up by hills, spurs from the parent range, and isolated mountains. The term "park" is usually applied to ground more or less artificially made; and these places are very properly called parks, for they look, if it be not rank heresy to liken nature to art, as if ground naturally picturesque had been carefully laid out and planted with most consummate skill and taste. Some of them are of great size, such as the North, Middle, South, and St. Louis Parks; others—and it is with them I am best acquainted—are comparatively small.

There are many things to arouse deep interest in that favored region. Where you find lofty mountains, foothills, plain, valley, forest, and quick-flowing stream, in a southern latitude, you have in combination all that can gratify the scientific student, as well as all that can content the eye of man, in the way of scenery. The philosopher who devotes himself to the study of atmospheric conditions could nowhere find a more fitting field for observation. The mountain ranges and extensive level spaces comprised within their limits are important factors in the economy of nature. The great masses of heat-radiating rock temper the winds that blow over them and shed genial warmth far and wide.

The whole region is one vast brewery of storms. Chemical changes are constantly going on. Electricity is working with exceptional vigor, riving the solid rocks, devastating trees, and putting forth most vividly the awful and mysterious manifestations of its strength. Hot currents and cold currents fight aerial battles round those patient peaks, that stand unmoved amidst the roar and racket of elemental strife. Frequent lightnings blaze or flicker round the mountain heads; continuous thunder crashes on their slopes and rolls and rumbles in the caverns and valleys that seam their sides. Tempests shriek round the crags and moan dismally as they toss the gnarled and matted branches of the stunted trees that force their adventurous way up the broad shoulders of the range. Snow in winter, rain and hail in summer, pour upon the higher summits, while beneath the land is glowing under a cloudless sky. Contending air currents of different density discharge their moisture on the hills. The sun draws up fresh moisture from the valleys, like drawing water from a well. All nature seems seething in that region of heat and cold, sunshine and tempest, dryness and damp, constantly fabricating those great cloud masses that, breaking away from their cradle, carry rain and fertility over thousands and thousands of miles. Sometimes they overexert themselves, carry their good intentions too far, exceed their proper limits, and, transgressing the boundaries of their native land, cross the wide Atlantic and pour their accumulated store of rain upon those already sodden little islands, Great Britain and Ireland.

The parks and valleys which spread out beneath the mountains or nestle cosily amid the warm folds of the forest mantles which clothe them play also an important part. They act as reservoirs; they catch the little, tiny, ice-cold rills that trickle out from under the ever-melting but never-melted snow, gather them together, hold them till they grow strong enough to carve their way through the granite flanks that hem them in, and launch them out into the world, forming rivulets bright and sparkling, flecked with light and shade, over which the quivering aspen bends from banks sweet and bright with flowers; growing into brooks down which lumber may be rafted; swelling into streams which carry irrigation and fertility to arid wastes, becoming rivers upon which steamboats ply and ships ride at anchor.

Physical geography is a fascinating science, and to the student of it nothing can be more interesting than to stand upon some commanding mountain top and, with a large, comprehensive view, study the configuration of the country that gives birth to those rivers that in their course determine the natural geographical features of a continent, and consequently shape the destiny of a race. From many a peak in Colorado the geographer can trace the devious line of the "watershed," the "divide" that separates the rivers and sends them out, each on its appointed course, and can see, shining like silver threads, the rivulets from which they spring. Looking westward and to the north and south he can see the fountains of both Plattes, of the Rio Grande—the grand river—the Arkansas, the Blue, the White, and the Bear Rivers, and other streams which unite to form that most extraordinary of all rivers on the American continent, the Colorado. Turning to the east a very different scene greets his eye. There, spread out like an ocean beneath him, lies the prairie, that great deposit of gravel, sand, and unstratified clays, the débris of the mountain range on which he stands.

Where could the geologist find a region more suitable for the exercise of his peculiar branch of science than one which combines the vast deposit of the prairies with mountain masses obtruded from the bowels of the earth, and deep canyons exposing broad sections of the earth's crust to his view? And where is the mineralologist more likely to be rewarded for his pains? As to the botanist, I would almost warn him from visting those scenes, lest he should never be able to tear himself away; for the variety of the flora is infinite, ranging from Alpine specimens blooming amid everlasting snows, to flowers of a very different character, growing in rich luxuriance in deep valleys under a subtropical sun.

I have not included hunting among the sciences, but in reality I might have done so. It is a very exact science, and one in which excellence is rarely obtained. Many men never become, never can become, good hunters. They are not endowed with the necessary faculties; and those who are gifted with them require years of study and hard work before they can be entitled to call themselves masters of the art. I hope no one labors under the delusion that hunting is a mere barbarous, bloodthirsty sport. Every good hunter will agree with me that it is not the killing of the animal that gives pleasure. The charm lies in overcoming difficulties—in matching your natural intelligence and acquired knowledge and skill against the instinct, cunning, intellect, and reason of the animal you are endeavoring to outwit.

The reward of the hunter is the same as that of the student of languages, of the archeologist, of the geologist—in fact, of all scientific people. His triumph is the triumph of unraveling a mystery, tracing and discovering a hidden fact, grappling with and overcoming a difficulty. It is the fact of overcoming, not the act of killing, that brightens the hunter's eye and renders his occupation so charming. The hunter's craft gives health, its surroundings are beautiful, it calls forth some of the best qualities of man, it is full of fascination, and it is no wonder that primitive races find it difficult to emerge from the hunting condition. It is most annoying that everything that is pleasant is all wrong. We all know that peoples, in their progress toward civilization, advance from the hunting to the pastoral state, from the pastoral to the agricultural, and from thence to a condition of existence in which the manufacturing instincts of man are fully developed. This is the sequence—hunting, cattle tending, sheep herding, fresh air, good water, lovely scenery, wholesome excitement, healthy lives, and—barbarism; agriculture, manufactures, great cities, hideous country, poisoned water, impure air, dirt, disease, and—civilization. It is difficult sometimes to know exactly what to say when preaching civilization to the savage. It is certain that in so far as the masses of the people are concerned the highest aim of civilization is to secure to a large number the same blessings that a small number obtain, freely and without trouble, in an uncivilized state.

It was sport, or, as it would be called in the States, hunting, that led me first to visit Estes Park. Some friends and I had visited Denver at Christmas to pay our proper devotions to the good things of this earth at that festive season, and hearing rumors of much game at Estes Park we determined to go there. We spent a day or two laying in supplies, purchasing many of the necessaries and a few of the luxuries of life, and wound up our sojourn in Denver with a very pleasant dinner at an excellent restaurant, not inaptly styled the "Delmonico" of the West. During dinner one of those sudden and violent storms peculiar to that region came on. When we sat down the stars were shining clear and hard with the brilliancy that is so beautiful in those high altitudes on a cold, dry midwinter night, and not a breath of wind disturbed the stillness of the air, but before we had half satisfied the appetites engendered by the keen, frosty atmosphere the stars were all shrouded in cloud, the gale was howling through the streets, and snow was whirling in the air, piling up in drifts wherever it found a lodgment and sifting in fine powder through every chink and cranny in the door. It did not last long. Before morning the sky was clear, cloudless, steely, star-bespangled as before, and when we left by an early train for Longmont Station the sun was shining undimmed upon the fields of freshly fallen snow.

By way of enlivening the journey we were treated by thoughtful nature to a magnificent spectacle—a beautiful exhibition of that phenomenon known, I believe, as a parhelion. The sun was only a few degrees above the horizon. The sky was very clear and intensely blue overhead, but slightly clouded with a thin gauzy film round the horizon, and, on looking up, one could see that the air was full of minute crystals of ice. It was tolerably cold—probably about 15° or 20° below zero—and perfectly calm. All around the horizon ran a belt of pure bright white light, passing through the sun. This belt was not exactly level, but dipped a little to the east and west, and rose slightly to the north and south. The sun was surrounded by a halo showing rainbow colors on the inside, which faded into white light on the outside edge. A bright perpendicular ray of white light cut through the sun, forming, with the belt that ran round the horizon, a perfect cross. There was a similar cross in the west, and another in the north, but none in the south at first, but after an hour or so a fourth cross formed in that quarter also. Right overhead was a partially formed horizontal rainbow, the colors of which were very bright. Sometimes this rainbow would develop into an almost perfect circle, then, again, it would diminish till there remained only a small segment of the circle. The points where the solar halo cut the belt which encircled the horizon were intensely brilliant—almost as bright as the sun—and rays of white light struck down from them. As the sun rose the halo surrounding it became very dazzling, and assumed the colors of the rainbow, and a second rainbow-tinted circle formed outside it. The rainbow in the zenith increased at the same time in brilliancy, and a second circle formed outside that also. The whole phenomenon was very beautiful; it continued some hours, gradually fading away, and finally disappeared about 3 in the afternoon.

The next morning we loaded up a wagon with stores and started on our toilsome expedition to the park. It is very easy work—it is not work at all, in fact—to get into the park nowadays. It was a very different affair at that time. There are two good stage roads now. There was no road at all then, only a rough track going straight up hill and down dale and over rocks and through trees and along nearly perpendicular slopes, with the glorious determination to go straight forward of an old Roman road, but without any of the engineering skill and labor expended upon the latter. It was a hard road to travel, covered with snow and slippery with ice; but, by dint of literally putting our shoulders to the wheel uphill, by chaining the wheels downhill, and by holding up the wagon by ropes and main strength on precipitous hillsides, we got to our destination very late at night, with only one serious accident—the fracture of a bottle containing medical comforts.

The road from Longmont to the park traverses the level plain for about 15 miles, and then enters a canyon flanked on either side by strange-shaped masses of bright red sandstone, outcropping from the surface, and in some places tilted nearly on end. It then follows along the bank of the St. Vrain River, teeming with trout, crosses that stream, and works its way, with many curves and twists, up through the foothills, along grassy slopes, through pine forests, past fantastic masses of rock, crosses a little creek hiding deep among aspens and poplars, and, after plunging down two violent descents and mounting up again, enters a long valley rejoicing in the euphonious title of "Muggins Gulch." I do not know who Muggins was—no doubt an honest citizen—but he should have changed his name before bestowing it upon such a pretty spot. You ascend this valley at an easy gradient till you reach the summit, when suddenly a lovely view bursts upon you, and the park lies spread out at your feet. On the left the hillside rises steeply, crowned with a buttress of frowning rock. On the right a mountain of almost solid rock stands naked and savage. In front, beyond the park, the main range of mountains rears itself, topped with snow, rent in great chasms, pierced by the gloomy heavily timbered depths of black canyon. On the extreme left and in the distance Longs Peak towers above its fellows, and beneath you, in strange contrast with the barren foothills through which you have passed and the savage, stern grandeur of the range, lies the park—undulating, grass covered, dotted with trees, peaceful, and quiet, with a silver thread of water curving and twining through its midst.

A log house is comfortable enough at any time, and on that particular night it appeared eminently so to us, as, cold and wearied, we passed the hospitable threshold. What a supper we devoured, and what logs we heaped upon the fire, till we made the flames leap and roar on the open hearth; and then lay down on mattresses on the floor and listened to the howling of the wind, till the noise of the tempest, confusedly mingling with our dreams, was finally hushed in deep, unbroken sleep.

The winter weather in northern Colorado is most enjoyable. At the high altitude of Estes Park, between 7,000 and 8,000 feet above sea level, it consists of alternate short storms and long spells of fine weather. You will have several days of bright clear weather, hard frost, the thermometer very low, but the sun so powerful that you can lie down and go fast asleep, as I have frequently done, on a warm, sunny, and sheltered bank, in the very depth of winter. Then the clouds begin to accumulate, growing denser and denser, till they break and descend in a snowstorm of some hours' duration. The cattle, which before dotted all the open ground, disappear as if by magic, seeking and finding shelter in little hidden gulches and unnoticed valleys, and the land looks utterly desolate. The snowstorm is invariably succeeded by a violent tempest of wind, which speedily clears the ground of snow, heaping it up in drifts, and blowing the greater part of it into the air in such a thin powdery condition that it is taken up by the atmosphere and disappears completely. So dry is the air and so warm the winter's sun that snow evaporates without leaving any moisture behind it. Another period of clear, still, cold weather then follows after the gale.

The violence of these tempests is very great. Many a night have I lain awake listening to the screams and clamor of the gale; now rising suddenly to a shriek as a fresh gust of wind came tearing down the level plain, snatching up pebbles and stones, sending them hopping over the ground, and hurling them against the log house; then sinking to a long melancholy moan; whistling shrilly around the walls, hoarsely howling in the wide chimney; while, under all, the low continuous roar of the tempest raging in the distant forest sounded like a mighty bass note in the savage music of the storm.

That is the time to appreciate the comfort of a warm weather-proof house, to snuggle up in your blanket and idly watch the merry sparks fly up the chimney, and the warm ruddy flicker of the fire casting shadows on the rough brown pine logs; gazing and blinking, listening and thinking, one's thoughts perhaps wandering very far away, and getting less and less coherent. The storm chimes in with your fancies, mingles with your dreams, till with a start you open your eyes, and find to your astonishment the level rays of the rising sun lighting up a scene as calm and peaceful as if the tempest had never been.

In spring and summer the scene and climate are very different. Ice and snow and withered grass have passed away, and everything is basking and glowing under a blazing sun, hot but always tempered with a cool breeze. Cattle wander about the plain—or try to wander, for they are so fat they can scarcely move. Water fowl frequent the lakes. The whole earth is green, and the margins of the streams are luxuriant with a profuse growth of wild flowers and rich herbiage. The air is scented with the sweet-smelling sap of the pines, whose branches welcome many feathered visitors from southern climes; an occasional humming bird whirrs among the shrubs, trout leap in the creeks, insects buzz in the air; all nature is active and exuberant with life.

I and a Scotch gillie, who had accompanied me from home, took up our abode in a little log shanty close to the ranch house, and made ourselves very cozy. There was not much elegance or luxury in our domicile, but plenty of comfort. Two rough rooms—a huge fireplace in one of them—two beds, and no other furniture of any kind whatever, completed our establishment. But what on earth did we want with furniture? We were up before daylight, out hunting or fishing all day, had our food at the ranch, sat on the ground and smoked our pipes, and went to bed early. One's rest is a good deal broken in wintertime, and it is necessary to go to bed early in order to get enough sleep, because in very cold weather it is highly advisable to keep a fire burning all night; and as yet hunters have not evolved the faculty of putting on logs in their sleep. It would be most useful if they could do so; and, according to the law of evolution, some of them by this time ought to have done it. However, I was not much troubled, for Sandie, who slept by the fire, was very wakeful. I would generally awake about 2 or 3 in the morning to find the logs blazing and crackling merrily, and Sandie, sitting in the ingle smoking his pipe, plunged in deep thought.

"Well, Sandie," I would say, "what kind of a night is it, and what are you thinking of?"

"Oh, well, it's a fine night, just a wee bit cheely outside [thermometer about 25° below zero]; and I'm thinking we did not make that stalk after the big stag just right yesterday; and I'm thinking where we'll go to-day to find him." Then we would smoke a little—have a little, as Sandie would call it—and discuss the vexed question of how we made the mistake with the big stag; and having come to a satisfactory conclusion and agreed that the stag had the biggest antlers that ever were seen—which is always the case with deer you don't get—we would put out our pipes and sleep till daylight warned us to set about our appointed task, which was to find a deer somehow, for the larder wanted replenishing.

In those days you had not far to seek for game, and you could scarcely go wrong in any direction at any season of the year. In winter and spring the park still swarms with game; but it is necessary in summer to know where to look for it, to understand its manners and customs, to go farther and to work harder than formerly, for Estes Park is civilized. In summer time beautiful but dangerous creatures roam the park. The tracks of tiny little shoes are more frequent than the less interesting but harmless footprints of mountain sheep. You are more likely to catch a glimpse of the flicker of the hem of a white petticoat in the distance than of the glancing form of a deer. The marks of carriage wheels are more plentiful than elk signs, and you are not now so likely to be scared by the humanlike track of a gigantic bear as by the appalling impress of a No. 11 boot.

That is as it should be. There is plenty of room elsewhere for wild beasts, and nature's beauties should be enjoyed by man. I well remember the commencement of civilization. I was sitting on the stoop of the log shanty one fine hot summer's evening, when to me appeared the strange apparition of an aged gentleman on a diminutive donkey. He was the first stranger I had ever seen in the park. After surveying me in silence for some moments he observed, "Say, is this a pretty good place to drink whisky in?" I replied, "Yes," naturally, for I have never heard of a spot that was not favorable for the consumption of whisky, the State of Maine not excepted. "Well, have you any to sell?" he continued. "No," I answered, "got none." After gazing at me in melancholy silence for some moments, evidently puzzled at the idea of a man and a house but no whisky, he went slowly and sadly on his way, and I saw him no more.

On the morning that Sandie and I went out, it was not necessary to go far from the house. We had not ridden long before we came to likely looking country, got off, unsaddled and tethered our horses, and started on foot, carefully scanning the ground for fresh sign. Soon we came upon it—quite recently formed tracks of three or four deer. Then we had to decide upon the plan of operations in a long and whispered conversation; and finally, having settled where the deer were likely to be, and how to get at them, we made a long circuit, so as to be down wind of the game, and went to work. The ground to which I am referring is very rough. It slopes precipitously toward the river. Huge masses of rock lie littered about on a surface pierced by many perpendicular jagged crags, hundreds of feet high, and long ridges and spurs strike downward from the sheer scarp that crowns the canyon of the river, forming beautiful little glades—sheltered, sunny, clothed with sweet grass—on which the deer love to feed.

In such a country there was no chance of seeing game at any distance; so we had to go very cautiously, examining every sign, crawling up to every little ridge, and inch by inch craning our heads over and peering into every bush and under every tree. In looking over a rise of ground it is advisable for the hunter to take off his head covering unless he wears a very tight-fitting cap. I have often laughed to see great hunters (great in their own estimation) raising their heads most carefully, forgetting that a tall felt hat, some 6 inches above their eyes, had already been for some time in view of the deer. Many hunters seem to think that the deer can not see them till they see the deer.

The sportsman can not go too slowly, and it is better to hunt out one little gully thoroughly than to cover miles of ground in the day. If he walks rapidly he will scare heaps of deer, hear lots of crashing in the trees and scattering of stones, and perhaps see the whisk of a white tail, or the glance of a dark form, through the trees, but never get a shot for his pains. We pursued a different plan—took each little gulch separately, and carefully crept up it, searching every inch of ground, using redoubled caution toward the end where the bush is thickest, and especially scanning the north side; for, strange to say, deer prefer lying on the north side of valleys in the snow, even during the coldest weather, to resting on the warm sunny grass on the southern slopes. Patiently we worked; but our patience was not well rewarded, for not a sign of anything did we see till our entirely foodless stomachs and the nearly shadowless trees indicated that it was past noon. So we sat us down in a nice little sheltered nook, from whence we commanded a good view of the precipitous cliffs and gullies that led down to the tortuous and icebound creek, some thousands of feet below us, as well as of the face of the mountain that reared itself on the opposite side, and betook ourselves to food and reflection. It is very pleasant to lie comfortably stretched out with nothing to do but to gaze with idle pleasure and complete content upon grand and varied scenery. The eye, now plunging into the abyss of blue crossed at intervals by swiftly moving clouds, now lowered and resting on the earth, pauses for a minute on the dazzling snow-white summits, then travels down through dark-green pine woods, wanders over little open glades or valleys gray with withered grass, glances at steep cliffs and great riven masses of rock which time and weather have detached and hurled down the mountain side, and falls at last upon the pale-green belt of aspens that fringes the rivers, white with snow where spanned with ice, but black as ink where a rapid torrent has defied the frost. Nor is the eye wearied with its journey; for mountain, valley, cliff, and glade are so mingled, and are so constantly changing with light and shade, that one could look for hours without a wish to move. The mind goes half asleep and wonders lazily whether its body is really there in the heart of the Rocky Mountains leading a hunter's life, or whether it is not all a dream—a dream of schoolboy days which seemed at one time so little likely to be realized, and yet which is at length fulfilled.

It must not be supposed that, because we were half asleep and wholly dreaming, we were not also keeping a sharp lookout; for in a man who is very much accustomed to take note of every unusual object, of every moving thing, and of the slightest sign of any living creature—more especially if he has roamed much on the prairies where hostile redskins lurk and creep—the faculty of observation is so constantly exercised that it becomes a habit unconsciously used, and he is all the time seeing sights, and hearing sounds, and smelling smells, and noting them down, and receiving all kinds of impressions from all external objects, without being the least aware of it himself. However, none of our senses were gratified by anything that betokened the presence of game, and, after resting a little while, we picked up our rifles and stole quietly on again. So we crept and hunted, and hunted and crept, and peered and whispered, and wondered we saw nothing, till the pine trees were casting long shadows to the east, when suddenly Sandie, who was a pace or two in front of me, became rigid, changed into a man of stone, and them, almost imperceptibly, a hairbreadth at a time, stooped his head and sank down. If you come suddenly in sight of game, you should remain perfectly motionless for a time, and sink out of sight gradually; for if you drop down quickly, the movement will startle it. Deer seem to be shortsighted. They do not notice a man, even close by, unless he moves. I never saw a man so excited at the sight of game, and yet so quiet, as Sandie. It seemed as if he would fly to pieces; he seized my arm with a grip like a vise, and whispered, "Oh, a great stag within easy shot from the big rock yonder. He has not seen me." So, prone upon the earth, I crawled up to the rock, cocked the rifle, drew a long breath, raised myself into a sitting position, got a good sight on the deer, pulled, and had the satisfaction of seeing him tumbling headlong down the gulch, till he stopped stone dead jammed between two trees.

Leaving Sandie to prepare the stag for transportation, I started off as fast as I could and brought one of the ponies down to the carcass. It was pretty bad going for a four-footed animal; but Colorado horses, if used to the mountains, will go almost anywhere. The way they will climb up places, and slither down places, and pick their way through "windfalls" is marvelous. They seem to be possessed of any number of feet and to put them down always exactly at the right moment in the right place. I do not suppose they like it, for they groan and grunt the while in a most piteous manner. My pony was sure-footed and willing, and, moreover, was used to pack game; so we had little trouble with him, and before long had the deer firmly secured on the saddle and were well on our way home. It was well for us that we killed the deer in a comparatively accessible place or we should not have got him in that night or the next day. It was almost dark when we topped the ridge and could look down into the park and see the range beyond, and there were plenty of signs there to show that a storm was at hand. Right overhead the stars were shining, but all the sky to the west was one huge wall of cloud. Black Canon, the canon of the river, and all the great rents in the range were filled with vapor, and all the mountains were wrapped in cloud.

When we left the ranch that night after a good supper, a game of euchre, and sundry pipes it was pitch dark and light flakes of snow were noiselessly floating down to the earth, and when we got up the next morning behold there was not a thing to be seen. Mountains, ranch house, and everything else were blotted out by a densely falling white, bewildering mass of snow. Toward noon it lightened up a little, and great gray shapes of mountains loomed out now and then a shade darker than the white wall that almost hid them; but the weather was not fit for hunting, and as there was nothing else to be done out of doors we made a fête of it, as a French-Canadian would say, and devoted ourselves to gun cleaning and spinning yarns.

When deep snow lies upon the higher grounds surrounding Estes Park wapiti come down into the park in considerable numbers. The wapiti is a splendid beast, the handsomest by far of all the deer tribe. He is called an elk in the States—why, I do not know; for the European elk is identical with the American moose, and a moose and a wapiti are not the least alike. But I presume the wapiti is called by the Americans an elk for the same reason that they call thrushes robins and grouse partridges. The reason, I dare say, is a good one, but I do not know what it is.

The wapiti enjoys a range extending from the Pacific seaboard to the Mississippi and from the northwest territories in British possessions down to Texas, and he formerly was found all the way across the continent and in the Eastern States. He is exactly like the European red deer—only about twice as large—carries magnificent antlers, and is altogether a glorious animal. Wapiti are very shy. They require quiet and large undisturbed pastures, and they are hunted with a thoughtless brutality that must shortly lead to their extermination in civilized districts. They do not accustom themselves to civilization as easily as do moose or antelope, but resent deeply the proximity of man; that is to say, of civilized man, for Indians do not interfere with them very much. Indians, as a rule, are not really fond of hunting; they hunt for subsistence, not for pleasure, and where buffalo are to be found never trouble their heads about smaller game. Elk are plentiful in any Indian country that suits them. In fact, as a rule, there is very little use in hunting wapiti in any country that is not exposed to Indian incursions, and the more dangerous the country the better sport you are likely to have; but this is not an invariable rule. There are some places where wapiti may be found in quite sufficient numbers to repay a sportsman's labor and where he need not incur the smallest risk to life or limb. I imagine there are more wapiti to be found in Montana and the adjacent territories than in any other part of the United States. Wapiti are to be met with in forests of timber, among the mountains, and on the treeless prairie. They are, I think, most numerous on the plains, but the finest specimens are found in timbered districts.

One might suppose that branching antlers would cause inconvenience to an animal running through the tangle of a primeval forest, but the contrary appears to be the case, for in all countries the woodland deer carry far finer heads than the stags of the same species that range in open country. The size of the antlers depends entirely on the food which the animal can procure. Where he is well fed, they will be well developed; where food is scarce, they will be small. In a timbered country there is more shelter than on the plains, the grass is not so deeply covered with snow in winter, and consequently food is more plentiful at that time of year and the animal thrives better. You always find heavier deer in woodland than in an open country. Early in the fall the stags gather large herds of hinds about them; about the end of October they separate, and the big stags wander off alone for a while, and then later on join in with the big bands of hinds and small stags. During the winter they run in great numbers—it is not unusual to find herds of two or three hundred together, and I have seen, I believe, as many as a thousand different wapiti within a week. A large herd of these grand animals is a magnificent sight and one not soon to be forgotten. They are to be killed either by stalking them on foot, or partially on foot and partially on horseback, or by running them on horseback as you would run buffalo.

THE PARK REGION AS SEEN BY AN ENGLISH LADY.

Fortunately for the region embraced in the proposed park, that part of Colorado was visited while yet in its primitive state by Miss Isabella L. Bird, who, like Lord Dunraven, was English, and like him also a traveler and writer of many books. She went to Colorado in 1873, after a visit to the tropical islands of the Pacific Ocean, and became so entranced with the beauties of the Longs Peak country that she spent two years in that vicinity, practically camping out. She wrote many letters to friends at home in England, which afterwards were collected and published in book form under the title of "A Lady's Life in the Rocky Mountains." The book was published in England and by Putnams, of New York, in 1880. These letters fairly teem with ecstatic praise of the atmosphere, the scenery, and the wild life of the country, and all are portrayed in such choice language and such graphic style as to render the little book a classic in travel literature.

Much of the text is occupied with Estes Park, but Miss Bird also spent considerable time in the adjoining mountains, and she was entranced by every spot. She was one of the first women to make an ascent of Longs Peak, that great sentinel of the Front Range. Her ascent of the peak, which is within this proposed national park, was made late in the fall and was replete with danger and hardship. Her account of the experience would be worth producing as a whole, but I present only a few descriptive extracts. To her this great mountain was king of all other Colorado peaks, and time and again she compares it to Mont Blanc and the Matterhorn. She first views the mountain from a glade much to her liking, of which she says:

This is an upland valley of grass and flowers, of glades and sloping lawns, and cherry-fringed beds of dry streams, and clumps of pines artistically placed, and mountain sides densely pine clad, the pines breaking into fringes as they come down upon the park and the mountains breaking into pinnacles of bold gray rock as they pierce the blue of the sky. A single dell of bright green grass on which dwarf clumps of the scarlet poison oak look like beds of geraniums slopes toward the west. Deep vast canyons, all trending westward, lie in purple gloom. Pine-clad ridges, rising into the blasted top of Storm Peak, all run westward, too, and all the beauty and glory are but the frame out of which rises—heaven piercing, pure in its pearly luster, as glorious a mountain as the sun tinges red in either hemisphere—the splintered, pinnacled, lovely, ghostly, impossible, double-peaked summit of Longs Peak, the Mount Blanc of northern Colorado. This is a view to which nothing needs to be added. This is the lodge in some vast wilderness for which one often sighs when in the midst of a bustle at once sordid and trival. This scenery satisfies my soul. * * *

This place is, indeed, far removed. It seems farther away than any place I have been to yet, except the frozen top of the volcano of Mauna Loa. It is so little profaned by man that if one were compelled to live here in solitude one might truly say of the bears, deer, and elk, which abound, "their tameness is shocking to me." It is the world of big game. Just now a big, heavy-bearded elk, with much branched horns fully 3 feet long, stood and looked at me and quietly trotted away. He was so near that I heard the grass, crisp with hoarfrost, crackle under his feet. Bears stripped the cherry bushes within a few yards of us last night. Now two lovely bluebirds, with crests on their heads, are picking about within a stone's throw.

Coming to Estes Park, where Miss Bird spent much of her time, she says:

From a ridge at a height of 9,000 feet we saw at last Estes Park, lying 1,500 feet below in the glory of the setting sun, an irregular basin, lighted up by the bright waters of the rushing Thompson, guarded by sentinel mountains of fantastic shape and enormous size, with Longs Peak rising above them all in unapproachable grandeur while the Snowy Range, with its outlying spurs heavily timbered, came down upon the park slashed by stupendous canyons lying deep in purple gloom. The rushing river was blood red, Longs Peak was aflame, the glory of the glowing heaven was given back from earth. Never, nowhere, have I seen anything to equal the view into Estes Park. * * *

We had an ascent of four hours through a ravine which gradually opened out upon this beautiful park. But we rode for some miles before the view burst upon us. The vastness of the mountain range, like astronomical distances, can hardly be conceived of. At this place I suppose it is not less than 250 miles wide, and with barely a break in its continuity it stretches almost from the Arctic Circle to the Straits of Magellan.

From the top of Longs Peak, within a short distance, 22 summits, each above 12,000 feet in height, are visible, and the Snowy Range—the backbone or divide of the continent—is seen snaking distinctly through the wilderness of ranges, with its waters starting for either ocean.

From the first ridge we crossed we had a singular view of range beyond range, cleft by deep canyons and abounding in elliptical valleys, richly grassed. The slopes of all the hills as far as one could see were waving with fine grass for the scythe, but the food of wild animals only. All these ridges are heavily timbered with pitch pines, and where they were down on the grassy slopes they looked as if the trees had been arranged by a landscape gardener. Far off, through an opening in a canyon, we saw the prairie, simulating an ocean. Far off, through an opening in another direction, was the glistening outline of the Snowy Range. * * *

You will ask, "What is Estes Park?" This name, with the quiet midland counties sound, suggests "park palings" well lichened, a lodge with a courtseying woman, fallow-deer, and a Queen Anne mansion. Such as it is, Estes Park is mine. It is unsurveyed, "no man's land," and mine by right of love, appropriation, and appreciation; by the seizure of its peerless sunrises and sunsets, its glorious afterglow, its blazing noons, its hurricanes sharp and furious, its wild auroras, its glories of mountain and forest, of canyon, lake, and river, and the stereotyping them all in my memory. Mine, too, in a better than the sportsman's sense, are its majestic wapiti, which play and fight under the pines in the early morning, as securely as fallow-deer under our English oaks; its graceful blacktails, swift of foot; its superb bighorns, whose noble leader is to be seen now and then with his classic head against the blue sky on the top of a colossal rock; its sneaking mountain lion with his hideous nocturnal caterwaulings, the great grizzly, the beautiful skunk, the wary beaver, who is always making lakes, damming and turning streams, cutting down young cottonwoods, and setting an example of thrift and industry; the wolf, greedy and cowardly; the coyote and the lynx, and all the lesser fry of mink, marten, wildcat, hare, fox, squirrel, and chipmunk, as well as things that fly, from the eagle down to the crested bluejay. May their number never be less, in spite of the hunter who kills for food and gain, and the sportsman who kills and marauds for pastime.

But still I have not answered the natural question, "What is Estes Park?" Among the striking peculiarities of these mountains are hundreds of high-lying valleys, large and small, at heights varying from 6,000 to 11,000 feet. The most important are North Park, held by hostile Indians; Middle Park, famous for hot springs and trout; South Park, rich in minerals; and San Luis Park. South Park is 10,000 feet high, a great rolling prairie, 70 miles long, well grassed and watered, but nearly closed by snow in winter. But parks innumerable are scattered throughout the mountains, most of them unnamed, and others nicknamed by hunters or trappers who have made them their temporary resorts. They always lie far within the flaming foothills, their exquisite stretches of flowery pastures dotted artistically with clumps of trees, sloping lawnlike to bright, swift streams full of red-waiscoated trout, or running up in soft glades into the dark forest, above which the snow peaks rise in their infinite majesty. Some are bits of meadow, a mile long and very narrow, with a small stream, a beaver dam, and a pond made by beaver industry. Hundreds of these can only be reached by riding in the bed of a stream or by scrambling up some narrow canyon till it debouches on the fairylike stretch above. These parks are the feeding grounds of innumerable wild animals, and some, like one 3 miles off, seem chosen for the process of antler casting, the grass being covered for at least a square mile with the magnificent branching horns of the elk.

Estes Park combines the beauties of all. Dismiss all thoughts of the midland counties. For park palings there are mountains, forest skirted, 9,000, 11,000, 14,000 feet high; for a lodge, two sentinel peaks of granite guarding the only feasible entrance; and for a Queen Anne mansion, an unchinked log cabin with a vault of sunny blue overhead. The park is most irregularly shaped, and contains hardly any level grass. It is an aggregate of lawns, slopes, and glades, about 18 miles in length, but never more than 2 miles in width. The Big Thompson, a bright, rapid trout stream, snow born on Longs Peak, a few miles higher, takes all sorts of magical twists, vanishing and reappearing unexpectedly, glancing among lawns, rushing through romantic ravines, everywhere making music through the still, long nights. Here and there the lawns are so smooth, the trees so artistically grouped, a lake makes such an artistic foreground, or a waterfall comes tumbling down with such an apparent feeling for the picturesque, that I am almost angry with nature for her close imitation of art. But in another hundred yards nature, glorious, unapproachable, inimitable, is herself again, raising one's thoughts reverently upward to her Creator and ours. Grandeur and sublimity, not softness, are the features of Estes Park. The glades which begin so softly are soon lost in the dark, primeval forests, with their peaks of rosy granite and their stretches of granite blocks piled and poised by nature in some mood of fury. The streams are lost in canyons nearly or quite inaccessible, awful in their blackness and darkness; every valley ends in mystery; seven mountain ranges raise their frowning barriers between us and the plains, and at the south end of the park Longs Peak rises to a height of 14,700 feet, with his bare, scathed head slashed with eternal snow.

The lowest part of the park is 7,500 feet high; and though the sun is hot during the day, the mercury hovers near the freezing point every night of the summer. An immense quantity of snow falls, but partly owing to the tremendous winds which drift it into the deep valleys, and partly to the bright, warm sun of the winter months, the park is never snowed up, and a number of cattle and horses are wintered out of doors on its sun-cured, saccharine grasses, of which the gramma grass is the most valuable. The soil here, as elsewhere in the neighborhood, is nearly everywhere coarse, gray, granite dust, produced probably by the disintegration of the surrounding mountains. It does not hold water and is never wet in any weather. There are no thaws here. The snow mysteriously disappears by rapid evaporation. The wild flowers are gorgeous and innumerable, though their beauty, which culminates in July and August, was over before I arrived, and the recent snow flurries have finished them. Here are dandelions, buttercups, larkspurs, harebells, violets, roses, blue gentian, columbine, painter's brush, and 50 others, blue and yellow predominating. Snakes and mosquitoes do not appear to be known here. Coming almost direct from the Tropics, one is dissatisfied with the uniformity of the foliage; indeed, foliage can hardly be written of, as the trees properly so called at this height are exclusively Coniferæ and bear needles instead of leaves. In places there are patches of spindly aspens, which have turned a lemon yellow, and along the streams bear cherries, vines, and roses lighten the gulches with their variegated crimson leaves. The pines are not imposing, either from their girth or height. Their coloring is blackish green, and though they are effective singly or in groups, they are somber and almost funereal when densely massed, as here, along the mountain sides.

The timber line is at a height of about 11,000 feet and is singularly well defined. The most attractive tree I have seen is the silver spruce, Abies engiemanii, near of kin to what is often called the balsam fir. Its shape and color are both beautiful. It looks as if a soft, blue, silver powder had fallen on its deep-green needles, or as if a bluish hoarfrost, which must melt at noon, were resting upon it. Anyhow, one can hardly believe that the beauty is permanent and survives the summer heat and the winter cold. The universal tree here is the Pinus ponderosa, but it never attains any very considerable size.

Miss Bird's account of her two days' climb of Longs Peak is accentuated by many interesting references to the scenery. Describing the view from "the Lift," about 500 feet below the summit, she says:

At the foot of the precipice below us lay a lovely lake, wood embosomed, from or near which the bright St. Vrain and other streams take their rise. I thought how their clear, cold waters, growing turbid in the affluent flats, would heat under the tropic sun and eventually form part of the great ocean river which renders our far-off islands habitable by infringing on their shores. Snowy ranges, one behind the other, extended to the distant horizon, folding in their wintry embrace the beauties of Middle Park. Pikes Peak, more than 100 miles off, lifted that vast but shapeless summit which is the landmark of southern Colorado. There were snowy patches, snow slashes, snow abysses, snow forlorn and soiled looking, snow pure and dazzling, snow glistening above the purple robes of pine worn by all the mountains, while away to the east in limitless breadth stretched the green gray of the endless plains. Giants everywhere reared their splintered crests. From thence with a single sweep the eye takes in a distance of 300 miles—that distance to the west, north, and south being made up of mountains ten, eleven, twelve, and thirteen thousand feet in height, dominated by Longs Peak, Grays Peak, and Pikes Peak, all nearly the height of Mount Blanc. On the plains we traced the rivers by their fringes of cottonwood to the distant Platte, and between us and them lay glories of mountain, canyon, and lake sleeping in depths of blue and purple most ravishing to the eye.

As we crept from the lodge round a horn of rock I beheld what made me perfectly sick and dizzy to look at—the terminal peak itself—a smooth, cracked face or wall of pink granite as nearly perpendicular as anything could well be up which it was possible to climb, well deserving the name of the American Matterhorn.

Her description of the mountain top itself was brief. She contents herself by saying of it simply that it was "an acre of bowlders."

From the summit we saw in unrivaled combinations all the views which had rejoiced our eyes during the ascent. It was something at last to stand upon the storm-rent crown of this lonely sentinel of the Rocky Range, on one of the mightiest of the vertebræ of the backbone of the North American Continent, and see the waters start for both oceans, uplifted above love and hate and storms of passion. Calm amidst the eternal silences, fanned by zephyrs, and bathed in living blue, peace rested for that one bright day on the peak as if it were some region "where falls not rain, or hail, or any snow, or ever winds blow loudly."

In closing my extracts from this fascinating book, I can not refrain from the author's reference to the color of the Rocky Mountains, which she says "beats all I have seen." She gives many bits of description in support of this statement, of which the following sentence is a fair sample:

The sky and the earth combine to form a wonderland every evening—such rich velvety coloring in crimson and violet; such an orange-green and vermilion sky; such scarlet and emerald clouds; such an extraordinary dryness and pureness of atmosphere, and then the glorious afterglow which seems to blend earth and heaven.

When this bill is signed by President Wilson there will be bequeathed to the United States and the world one of the most beautiful and attractive places ever evolved by nature for the pleasure of mankind. And its dedication to the present and future generations is a noble and patriotic act, for which the men and women who have supported this measure may all well feel proud.

The creation by Congress to-day of this national park will be a milestone in the development of Colorado, and I am supremely proud to be able to render this service to my beloved Commonwealth. It will be worth many millions of dollars to Colorado and many times that sum to the Nation.

The State of Colorado has always been one of the most enthusiastic champions of the slogan "See America first." President Roosevelt referred to the Centennial State as the "Playground of the Nation," and many citizens of our country proudly and affectionately refer to the State as "the Switzerland of America." The State has more than 5,000 miles of excellent State highways, 20,000 miles of improved county roads on the plains, the foothills, through the mountains and valleys, amidst magnificent scenery. With fine camping, hunting, hundreds of good trout streams, and 320 days of sunshine in every year, she invites the human race to come and enjoy her superb health-giving climate and unique mountain scenery of unparalleled grandeur and marvelous beauty.

Mr. Speaker, I am now pleased to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and I know the State of Colorado will be exceedingly grateful to him for speaking in behalf of this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the passage of this bill. I have seen a good deal of the country in Colorado. I believe the most valuable purpose for which a country like this can be used is for the preservation of its scenery. I think the time will come, and I hope it will not be very long in the future, when the vast hordes of Americans who now go across the Atlantic to see some mild scenery over there will restrain their curiosity for the other side of the ocean and visit some of the grand scenery in this country which is to be found in the Rocky Mountains. It will be a good thing even financially, and it would broaden the minds of those gentlemen who live along the Atlantic coast, many of whom never have gone as far west as the Allegheny Mountains and who do not know that there exists a portion of the country west of the Mississippi. [Applause.] This makes into a national park what in the main is now a national forest. As I understand, nearly all of this territory embraced in this bill is now covered by reservations for national forests and it makes it into a national park. It does not make a large appropriation, but leaves to the people who manage the park the problem of working out some method by which the park will pay for itself in the way of maintenance and improvements. Personally, next to working in a garden, I would rather climb one of the Colorado mountains in August, way above the snow line, than do anything else. I believe it will be inspiring to all of our people who will do that. There can be no damage in creating such a park, and I hope that every Member of Congress as he crosses the continent this summer, if he does, will stop on the way coming or going and see the Rocky Mountains. There is no other part of the world, unless it be in the high places in Asia or in the Andes, which compares in grandeur with the Rocky Mountains, and there is nothing that makes a man feel that he ought to be great and grow big like it does to go out and see what nature has done. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, I believe in having the public domain used for those things for which it is fitted. This piece of property is peculiarly adapted to the purpose designated, and is not adapted, in my opinion, to any other purpose. It should be dedicated as a pleasure ground and a scenic attraction to all our people, and the difference between its being held under the forest reserve and under the Department of the Interior as a national park is simply this—that as a national park the animal life will be forever free from molestation. Moreover, there will be no question of timber cutting for utilitarian purposes, but the property, which has few available commercial resources, will be held in a state of nature, and for which it is peculiarly adapted. I know of no other part of the United States better fitted for park purposes. It should be dedicated to the people of the United States as a public park forever. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to use five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, this seems to be about the only bill that is going through this Congress on greased skids, except some of the bills on the administration program. Here is a bill referred to the Committee on the Public Lands on January 12, and here it is before the House under suspension of the rules on January 18.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about the dates.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am reading from the bill here.

Mr. MANN. October 9 it was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And reported out on the 12th. and acted on in just one week. I find here in the Rocky Mountain News of January 6 a statement to the effect that this bill will be passed on the 18th day of January, and telling just how it will be done. I find a report of 48 pages accompanying this bill. The report reads as if it were a one-sided hearing on the bill. I understand hearings were held on the bill, but they have not been printed, and they can not be had.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman from Washington that hearings were held. The report was referred to the gentlemen who appeared before the committee so that they could correct their testimony. The governor of the State and two United States Senators and a number of other distinguished people appeared before the committee, and the hearings were sent around to these gentlemen for correction, and they got back to the committee only the other day, when they were sent down here, two or three days ago, to the printer. I was in hopes that they would be here by this time, but it is no fault of anybody.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. At any rate, the bill itself has gotten ahead of the hearings. There will now be no need of printing the hearings.

The statement has been made here that there is no opposition whatever to the bill. I hold in my hand a letter signed by the Front Range Settlers' League, dated December 8, in which quite a number of substantial arguments are made against this bill. I have received the past week quite a number of letters from citizens of Colorado who oppose the measure. I call attention to the fact that the park you are about to create is in a forest reserve; that it cuts the reserve in two; that it will increase the number of Federal employees; that the park scheme adds nothing to the great natural scenic beauty, nor will it make the locality one bit more accessible; in fact, it will simply give tourists an opportunity to pay more, and will develop the schemes of real estate speculators and hotel men, who have already secured the available hotel sites, which are, by the way, outside of the proposed park area and will not be subject to regulations governing national parks.

A magnificent road to Estes Park is already constructed, built by the State and the Forestry Bureau—principally by the State. The Forest Service proposes additional roads, but here, all of a sudden, it is proposed to yank Estes Park away from its present control and change its name to Rocky Mountain National Park. One citizen of Colorado writes:

> More work has been done in road building by the State and the Forest Service in one year than we could hope to get from the Government in 10 years. I base this observation on a study of the yearly appropriations of Congress for national parks.

Another gentleman says in a letter:

> In talking with a former forest rider I learned that Enos A. Miles, owner of Longs Peak Inn, at the foot of Longs Peak, is the originator of this national-park idea, and that he and his associates have purchased and obtained options on large tracts and on all the best grounds about Horse Shoe Park, all of which will be taken in by the Rocky Mountain National Park.

I have no information as to whether that statement is exactly correct or not.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman that since those original lines were proposed they have changed the lines and have eliminated all of that Estes Park, so it is not in the park.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The writer of the letter says further:

> I can not see where there is any benefit to the people of the United States or of Colorado in making this ground into a national park only to enrich Mills and his associates by advertising his hotel and lands, for the amount of money to be obtained will only police the park partly, and nothing will be expended on roads and trails for the next 20 or 30 years.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What does this fellow want to use it for?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. He sees, no doubt, that the tract is now as great a scenic attraction as it ever will be without going to additional Government expense. In the 48 pages of this report—a most remarkable report—you will find on the last page an argument saying all the other national parks are on the west of the Rocky Mountains and to a greater or less extent inaccessible.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would like to know what this kicker wants to do with this national park.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The roads and trails have been built in there. It is now accessible to everyone for its scenic beauty. You can go through it in an automobile or a wagon or a motor cycle without cost, whereas if it is made into a park it will cost $5 a vehicle.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to have two minutes more.

Mr. MOORE. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to obstruct the passage of this bill to the extent of making a point of no quorum. I simply want to call attention to the difficulties that so many important bills are having—no hearings and no chance—while this one, for which no emergency exists, gets a peculiar right of way. It provides for a park to be maintained by the Government. The plan is to take over a beautiful natural tract for the benefit of the automobilists principally. It gets the right of way in the Committee on the Public Lands, while 400 other bills which do not relate to playgrounds or to play of any kind repose peacefully in the pigeonholes of that committee's room. Particularly I want to call attention to the haste with which this bill has been sent out of the committee, into the House for passage, on to the calendar, and up for passage—if not by unanimous consent, then by suspension of the rules. As I said a moment ago, it is one that skids in the good old-fashioned way.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Are there any other national park bills pending before that committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think so.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Have any of them been reported?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield more time, but I thought the gentleman from Colorado wanted to use some.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Do I understand this is in a forest reserve?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Is there any timber there?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Not of much value, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think, if there should be, it ought to be preserved as a natural curiosity. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We have not the timber in our State that you have in your State.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If there is any forest reserve that has any timber on it, that timber ought to be preserved.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I now yield, Mr. Speaker, two minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I doubt if there is anything that I could add to the eloquent statement of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] and to the more than eloquent statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on the establishment of parks in the Rocky Mountains. I am glad to say that I think this is the very purpose for which this land should be used. It is already a reserved area, and this bill transfers it from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of the Interior. There is no friction about it. Both departments agree to it. Both have reported in favor of it. It can be administered economically, and the people of Colorado are very desirous of it. Both their outgoing governor and their incoming governor and different conservation societies from Chicago and elsewhere, all over the country, are in favor of it, and telegrams have been received from everywhere asking that this park be created.

We have only 13 parks in the United States. They do not cost the Government very much to maintain, and even if they did, it would be worth while. So many citizens, I think, are so far removed from any personal contact with the Federal Government now that it is wise to arrange these national playgrounds for them where appropriate. This is an ideal spot for it. It ought to have been done years ago. The Colorado delegation are entitled to great credit for it. I am proud to have been an humble member of the great Committee on the Public Lands who have reported it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it true that the gentleman's Committee on the Public Lands has caused it to be stated that it would authorize no more national parks during this session of Congress?

Mr. FERRIS. No. No such statements have been made to us or by us, so far as I know. I can not think any such statement has been made by anyone. It does not sound like our committee. I think there must be some mistake about that.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I do.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman's committee does not intend any such policy as that, I hope?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, not at all. I never heard of it before. There is nothing of that sort intimated by anyone.

I merely desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that the committee used every precaution in consulting the local people and the Interior Department and the Department of Agriculture and the Forest Service and the Geological Survey people and everybody that would know anything about it. I think this park is well conceived and the details are well worked out. It follows the usual procedure in the establishment of national parks, and it is not a park for the State of Colorado alone, but it is a park for the enjoyment of the people of other States as well. The people of my own State, in the hot and arid months, and the people from the States of New Mexico, Kansas, Texas, and adjoining States journey out there in one form and another and spend a month or two in that locality.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the gentleman what is the recommendation of the Committee on Agriculture in regard to this park?

Mr. FERRIS. It is in favor of it, and so is the Interior Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why did the committee not follow the recommendation of the department in creating a bureau of national parks? The department says that on several occasions they have approved of the creation of such a bureau, and several bills have been reported separately creating these national parks. The Secretary recommends that there should be a uniform bill apply to all of them.

Mr. FERRIS. The committee has such bills before it, and they have been urged very vigorously to do so by the officials of the department. So far as I am concerned, I do not care to create any more officials or add to the expense of the Government at this time. We have too many officers now I fear, and we ought to go slow on new ones until the war lets up and our commerce again gets started.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to my colleague from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the passage of this bill. I represent the district in which the greater part of the national park herein proposed is located. I have never received a single line from any resident of that district protesting against the passage of this bill. My constituents clearly recognize the value of this legislation in benefiting not only the State, but the entire country.

I wish I could take the Members of this House to Colorado and give them an opportunity to observe the natural beauty of this park and the wonderful scenery it contains. It comprises some of the loftiest snow-covered peaks in the Rocky Mountain States, with a large number of lakes, valleys, and parks. I know, Mr. Speaker, that it will afford every American citizen who visits this region a feeling of pride and satisfaction that he has a proprietary interest in this great natural scenic property. In common with citizens of Colorado and Representatives of other States, I believe that Congress is doing something not only for the State, but also for the Nation in passing this bill.

I wish to express on behalf of the citizens of our State our appreciation of the generous and friendly interest which Members from other States have shown in this bill.

We are particularly grateful to the Speaker of the House, who has afforded my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] an opportunity to bring the bill before the House under suspension of the rules, and to the able leader of the minority [Mr. MANN], who has given material assistance in advocating the passage of the measure.

The people of Colorado will not be backward in contributing to the care and maintenance of the park, in cooperation with the General Government. They will see to it that the scenic attractions, not only of this park but of the entire Rocky Mountain region, are brought more fully to the attention of the American people. For many years thousands of American tourists have contributed to the support and development of European tourist centers, unmindful of the fact that we have in this country some of the greatest natural wonders of the world. While we deplore the calamity of war which is now devastating Continental Europe, we hope that it will have one effect at least, and that to interest our American citizens in the natural beauties of our own country. Every section of the Nation has a wealth of physical beauty that should appeal to citizens of other sections. There should be an intermingling of tourist travel within our own borders. We have all degrees of climate, and there is no limit to the number and variety of medicinal and healthful springs. "See America first" should be the slogan in every section. Transportation lines should be encouraged to aid in this movement; and if we can retain within our borders a large share of the wealth which we have been sending abroad through American tourists we will do much to develop and enlarge our natural scenic assets. The people of Colorado, through their Representatives in Congress, will always be willing to aid in the creation of national parks in other States where their creation is justified.

The park provided for in this bill is most accessible to the great population of the Middle West and Southwestern States. It is directly on the line of travel between the two oceans; and when its attractions are more fully known it will draw many thousands annually, not only to Colorado but to the Pacific coast and the great Yellowstone and Glacier Parks. Constructive legislation of this character not only directly benefits the locality affected but indirectly helps other sections. The support which the bill has received from nature lovers whose attention has been directed to it is most gratifying, and the passage of the bill will be welcomed by citizens generally who are actively interested in the preservation and protection of our natural resources.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I have made two or three trips that led me over the Rocky Mountains. I do not know that I have been through that portion of the mountains that is described within the limits of the proposed park, but from my general knowledge of the Rocky Mountains I believe the lands within these described boundaries are not suitable for agricultural purposes. In fact, I do not know of any other purpose to which the mountains or the scenery could be put, or any to which it is so well adapted, as that of a park. I think the Committee on Public Lands is rendering the entire country a great service by reporting favorably upon this bill and urging that a national park be established there.

I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that every citizen of our country should see as much of the Rocky Mountains as possible. It should be made as attractive as may be for our citizens to go there, and every convenience for their comfort while they are there in the way of travel and hotels should be provided, and if perchance some hotel keeper can be induced to spend his money to build a hotel for the accommodation of such guests as may pass that way, the writer of the letter to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] will have no real ground for complaint. It probably will not cost him anything.

There is no reasonable objection that can come from any source to the establishment of this park, and there is every argument in its favor. I heartily favor the bill, and hope it will have the necessary votes to insure its passage.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, all of the land that is comprised within this proposed national park is now within national forest reservations, and with the limitation of expense contained in the bill there will be little or no increased expense unless Congress shall hereafter expressly authorize it. Therefore from any standpoint there is no reason why this bill should not pass, and there are many reasons why it should.

I am especially glad for one thing, Mr. Speaker, to find that these gentlemen who have thundered so long and so loudly against bureaucracy in reference to our national domain in the West have come before our committee, and now come on the floor of the House and ask for a little more bureaucracy with reference to the 230,000 acres comprised within this proposed park. When our committee held its hearings I was amazed to hear some gentlemen, not Members of this body, but of another, urge most strenuously before our committee the creation of this park because of the fact that the National Government could so well administer it and take such splendid care of it; and it struck me at the time that if those gentlemen would apply a little more of the same reasoning with reference to certain other portions of the national domain, we might get along very much better in the consideration of some of these matters.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman think it would take any less money to care for the remaining portion of the forest reserve after the 240,000 acres were taken out for this park?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, yes; it would cost considerably less, of course.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I doubt it.

Mr. LENROOT. From every standpoint I am heartily in favor of this bill.

Mr. MOORE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

[Mr. LAFFERTY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. KENT. I should like to ask the gentleman if he would be willing to say that to the members of the committee? Because I am quite sure that the Public Lands Committee as a whole have no knowledge of any such alleged facts and do not tolerate any such statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I was rather inclined to be against this bill until I heard the moving appeal of my friend from Illinois, the distinguished leader of the minority [Mr. MANN], who is a learned and earnest lover of nature. When he held out to us the prospect of seeing him climb that mountain in August, I found that I could not resist his argument. I trust he will realize, however, that in making that ascent, considering the present state of social aridity in Colorado, he will remember to carry something more than the coat on his back. I promise him that with that prospect in view, and the other that he hinted at of having the privilege to go out there this summer, I shall cordially indorse him and follow him in this vote. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, how much time is remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] has one minute, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] three minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire to make an inquiry and a suggestion in regard to this bill.

Mr. MOORE. I have but three minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I notice that most of the time has been given to those in favor of the bill. I think there ought to be an opportunity for a suggestion about it by those who may not be in favor of it.

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman had better direct his inquiry to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], who is in charge of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. You were supposed to have the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. MOORE. I am going to yield to myself, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time is running.

Mr. MOORE. If my time is running, I shall have to decline to yield.

Mr. SHERLEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to know if it is in order for a person in charge of the time in opposition to yield all the time to gentlemen who speak in favor of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky knows that the gentlemen in charge of time can distribute it to whom they please.

Mr. SHERLEY. But men get time in opposition under the statement that they are opposed to legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] demanded a second. No one else demanded a second, nor did anyone indicate that he was opposed to the bill, nor did the gentleman from Pennsylvania indicate it. The Chair can not now control the parceling out of the time.

Mr. MOORE. I should have been glad to have yielded to the gentleman from Kentucky if he had asked it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the request of the gentleman from Kentucky ought to be granted; but the suggestion that the gentleman made is unfair to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who, like anyone else in control of time, if people do not come who are opposed to the bill, he yields the time to those in favor of it. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky have three minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to talk on the bill, except to call attention to some language in it which I think ought to be corrected. I do not want to be arbitrary or make any point of no quorum, but I do want to call attention to some of the language in the bill.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Kentucky had been in the Chamber——

Mr. SHERLEY. I was at work in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman was busy in the Committee on Appropriations, but if he had been here he would have had no difficulty in getting time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky have three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the language in the proviso, which, as has been suggested, may create a permanent appropriation of $10,000 annually, and which nobody would desire to do. I also want to suggest the wisdom of striking out the language which requires that all funds derived from concessions, privileges, or other sources within the park shall be expended therein.

At this time there is no reason why that should not be done, and probably there will not be any reason in the near future, but I hope we are reaching a point where we are going to adopt some system for making national parks yield some revenue that may help to sustain them, and we ought not to tie up by this all the revenues that may come from a particular park.

It is a mistaken notion that parks belong to the localities where they exist. That is one of the vices I find running all through the arguments of gentlemen from public-land States—the assumption that the public land belongs to those States, which I will never agree to as long as I may be able to protest against it.

Now, we ought not to reserve all the revenues that come from any particular park and say that they must be expended in that park. My committee makes appropriations for these parks. At present we do spend in the parks all the revenue that comes from them, but we may reach a time when it will be desirable to place the revenue in a general fund and expend that fund for park purposes generally and not on any particular locality.

Mr. MANN. The amendment which is offered provides that not more than $10,000 shall be appropriated in any one year. Does not the gentleman think that the park will come and ask for a change, and we can make the other change?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think they will ask for one change, but will not concede the other.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman from Kentucky and I will be here, and if we are they will not get it.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from Illinois may not be here and I may not.

Mr. MANN. Well, some one will be here to take care of it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I see no reason why we should have the provision in the bill, and I suggest that there is no need for it. We ought not to segregate the fund in this way.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, one reason for demanding a second on this bill was to give an opportunity for just such questions as the gentleman from Kentucky has raised.

The practice of the House in calling up bills suddenly without notice is very unfair to the main body of the Members who might be interested in them but who are engaged in committee work or are at their offices. Because of it bills that are not wholly meritorious might occasionally get through except for the watchfulness of two or three careful Members on the floor.

I sought information as to the wisdom of passing this bill. I did not say that I opposed the bill, but I did want to have it discussed. The arguments in favor of the bill have been quite convincing, but the discussion has invited comment from those of us who come from the Atlantic seaboard.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made an intensely interesting talk advising people who live in the eastern part of the country to go out to the Rocky Mountains and "see America first." He wanted them to get a grasp of the beauty and the magnificence of this land of ours. That is exactly what most of us have done. Many of us have gone over the Rocky Mountains, over the Canadian Pacific, riding by the snow-capped peaks, and we have enjoyed to the full the grandeur of the scenery. We glory in all this, but sometimes, when these reports come in from the Committee on Public Lands, and we recall that in a State like Pennsylvania, for instance, where we have great forest reserves which we take care of ourselves at the expense of the people of the State, we wonder why we should be criticized for seeking river and harbor improvements to create revenue to care for the forests and parks of other States. This, however, is only in passing. I am inclined to think that this is a good bill. We ought to preserve our natural beauty spots, not alone for those who come from foreign shores, but for the people in our own land.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that some question is being made concerning lines 14 and 15, on page 7, about the expenditure of funds derived from concessions, and as I do not want to jeopardize the bill by meeting opposition, I ask uanimous consent to strike those two lines out.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his motion so as to make that one of his amendments?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to modify his motion by the amendment which he proposes and which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, line 14, after the word "therein," strike out "all funds derived from concessions, privileges, or other sources within the park shall be expended therein."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill as amended.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection of the request of the gentlemen from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR and Mr. SELDOMRIDGE] and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] to extend and revise their remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING FOR STOCK-RAISING HOMESTEADS.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 15799) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes, as amended, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for any person qualified to make entry under the homestead laws of the United States to make a stock-raising homestead entry for not exceeding 640 acres of unappropriated unreserved public land in reasonably compact form: Provided, however, That the land so entered shall theretofore have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as "stock-raising lands."

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, on application or otherwise, to designate as stock-raising lands subject to entry under this act lands, the surface of which is, in his opinion, chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops, do not contain merchantable timber, are not susceptible of irrigation from any known source of water supply, and are of such character that 640 acres are reasonably required for the support of a family.

SEC. 3. That any qualified homestead entryman may make entry under the homestead laws of lands so designated by the Secretary of the Interior, according to legal subdivisions, in areas not exceeding 640 acres, and in compact form so far as may be subject to the provisions of this act, and secure title thereto by compliance with the terms of the homestead laws: Provided, That instead of cultivation as required by the homestead laws the entryman shall be required to make permanent improvements upon the land entered before final proof is submitted tending to increase the value of the same for stock-raising purposes, of the value of not less than $1.25 per acre, and at least one-half of such improvements shall be placed upon the land within three years after the date of entry thereof.

SEC. 4. That any homestead entryman of lands of the character herein described, who has not submitted final proof upon his existing entry, shall have the right to enter, subject to the provisions of this act, such amount of contiguous lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act as shall not, together with the amount embraced in his original entry, exceed 640 acres, and residence upon the original entry shall be credited on both entries, but improvements must be made on the additional entry equal to $1.25 for each acre thereof.

SEC. 5. That persons who have submitted final proof upon, or received patent for, lands of the character herein described under the homestead laws, and who own and reside upon the land so acquired, may, subject to the provisions of this act, make additional entry for and obtain patent to contiguous lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act, which, together with the area theretofore acquired under the homestead law, shall not exceed 640 acres, on proof of the expenditure required by this act on account of permanent improvements upon the additional entry.

SEC. 6. That in the event there are not contiguous lands in area sufficient to complete an entry of 640 acres, as provided for in this act, the entryman or patentee shall have the right to enter within a radius of 10 miles from his first entry subject to the same requirements as specified for contiguous additional entries, lands in reasonably compact form which have been designated for entry under the provisions of this act, that shall, together with the first entry, not exceed 640 acres: Provided, That the entryman shall be required to enter all contiguous areas open to entry prior to the entry of any noncontiguous land.

SEC. 7. That any person who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of 21 years and is a citizen of the United States, who has entered or acquired under the homestead laws, prior to the passage hereof, lands of the character described in this act, the area of which is less than 640 acres, and who is unable to exercise the right of additional entry herein conferred because no lands subject to entry under this act adjoin the tract so entered or acquired or lie within the 10-mile limit provided for in this act, may, upon submitting proof that he resides upon and has not sold or encumbered the land so entered or acquired, relinquish or reconvey to the United States the land so occupied, entered, or acquired, and in lieu thereof, within the same land-office district, may enter and acquire title to 640 acres of the land subject to entry under this act, but must show compliance with all the provisions of this act respecting the new entry and with all the provisions of existing homestead laws except as modified herein: Provided, That the lands so relinquished or reconveyed as herein provided shall thereafter be subject to disposition only on such terms and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

SEC. 8. That the commutation provisions of the homestead laws shall not apply to any entries made under this act.

SEC. 9. That any homestead entrymen or patentees who shall be entitled to additional entry under this act shall have, for 30 days after the designation of lands subject to entry under the provisions of this act and contiguous to those entered or owned and occupied by him, the preferential right to make additional entry as provided in this act: Provided, That where such lands contiguous to the lands of two or more entrymen or patentees entitled to additional entries under this section are not sufficient in area to enable such entrymen to secure by additional entry the maximum amounts to which they are entitled, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make an equitable division of the lands among the several entrymen or patentees, applying to exercise preferential rights, such division to be in tracts of not less than 40 acres, and so made as to equalize as nearly as possible the area which such entrymen and patentees will acquire by adding the tracts embraced in additional entries to the lands originally held or owned by them: Provided further, That where but one 40-acre tract of vacant land may adjoin the lands of two or more entrymen or patentees entitled to exercise preferential right hereunder, the tract in question may be entered by the person who first submits to the local land office his application to exercise said preferential right.

SEC. 10. That any person who has heretofore acquired title to land of the character designated in this act under any of the homestead laws of the United States and who is the owner and occupant of the land so acquired may purchase from the United States not exceeding 320 acres of stock-raising lands, as designated by this act, or unappropriated and unreserved lands valuable only for grazing contiguous to his said homestead, upon paying to the United States the sum of $1.25 per acre for such lands, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, which said land, together with the area theretofore acquired under the homestead laws, shall not exceed 640 acres.

SEC. 11. That all entries made and patents issued under the provisions of this act shall be subject to and contain a reservation to the United States of all the coal and other minerals in the lands so entered and patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. The coal and other mineral deposits in such lands shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the coal and mineral land laws in force at the time of such disposal. Any person qualified to locate and enter the coal or other mineral deposits, or having the right to mine and remove the same under the laws of the United States, shall have the right at all times to enter upon the lands entered or patented, as provided by this act, for the purpose of prospecting for coal or other mineral therein, provided he shall not injure, damage, or destroy the permanent improvements of the entryman or patentee, and shall be liable to and shall compensate the entryman or patentee for all damages to the crops on such lands by reason of such prospecting. Any person who has acquired from the United States the coal or other mineral deposits in any such land, or the right to mine and remove the same, may reenter and occupy so much of the surface thereof as may be required for all purposes reasonably incident to the mining or removal of the coal or other minerals, first, upon securing the written consent or waiver of the homestead entryman or patentee; second, upon payment of the damages to crops or other tangible improvements to the owner thereof, where agreement may be had as to the amount thereof; or, third, in lieu of either of the foregoing provisions, upon the execution of a good and sufficient bond or undertaking to the United States for the use and benefit of the entryman or owner of the land, to secure the payment of such damages to the crops or tangible improvements of the entryman or owner, as may be determined and fixed in an action brought upon the bond or undertaking in a court of competent jurisdiction against the principal and sureties thereon, such bond or undertaking to be in form and in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior and to be filed with and approved by the register and receiver of the local land office of the district wherein the land is situate, subject to appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office: Provided, That all patents issued for the coal or other mineral deposits herein reserved shall contain appropriate notations declaring them to be subject to the provisions of this act with reference to the disposition, occupancy, and use of the surface of the land.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations in harmony with the provisions and purposes of this act for the purpose of carrying the same into effect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Mexico asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from New Mexico is recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, before I take up the bill, I ask unanimous consent to modify my original motion, by incorporating in section 10, line 8, page 6, after the word "land," the words "of the character designated in this act." It is obvious that that was the intention.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Mexico asks unanimous consent to modify his motion by inserting an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 8, after the word "land," insert the words "of the character designated in this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I take the liberty of asking what were the amendments which were offered with the bill? No one could tell from the reading of the bill what the amendments were. They were not committee amendments, reported in the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendments which were read into the bill.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, after the word "family," strike out the words: "Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall not designate for entry under this act lands of such character that, in his opinion, 640 acres will not support a family."

Page 4, line 24, after the word "provisions," strike out the words "of the homestead law and," and in line 25, after the word "entry," insert the words "and with all the provisions of existing homestead laws except as modified herein."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to restore the beef and mutton producing capacity of the semiarid States of the West, and at the same time enable the settlers to get homes, and thus promote the settlement and prosperity of these semiarid States by inducing settlers to get title to the land and to become taxpayers.

It is conceded by those who want to lease parts of this semiarid country, and also maintained by those who are in favor of homesteading all that can be reduced to homes, that the meat-producing capacity of the West—beef and mutton—has been reduced; some claim at least 50 per cent, about half of what they could produce in that semiarid country, comprising something like 330,000,000 acres. It has been reduced from overcrowding. There is no order. First there is sheep and then cattle. A man takes a homestead and can not raise anything because there is not enough land in 160 or even 320 acres to enable him to do anything in the way of grazing. The title of this bill is, "To provide for stock-raising homesteads." Now, the advantage of a grazing homestead is obvious to anybody. He will farm all that he can. The land will be subject to taxation. He will improve the stock; he will provide for winter feed for his stock; he will improve the kind of forage—sudan grass and fedrietta—and all improvements; whereas on an immense cattle range a man leases 10,000 or 20,000 acres of land; it will be impossible for him to improve or produce any quantity of meat. That is the general idea of introducing this bill. The question of leases is not disposed of by the enactment of this bill for this reason, that there are many hundreds of thousands of acres of land in these semiarid States. Six hundred and forty acres of land will be enough for a man to raise 20 or 30 beeves and do any farming. There is no sort of doubt about that, and the balance of all this immense area will be subject to disposition by Congress hereafter if it should be advisable under the leasing laws. Mr. Speaker, under the time to which I am limited I will not have time to go into the details of the various provisions of the bill, and I will be glad to submit it with these few preliminary remarks, reserving the balance of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the homestead laws provide for a homestead of 160 acres. In some instances the provisions of law have been changed so that some homesteads are authorized at 320 acres, some at 640 acres, but everyone, I think, has realized that there was occasion from time to time to make some changes as to the amount of acreage which might be required in a homestead where the conditions of the land require it. Now, here is a bill coming in here to-day, 8 pages long, 12 sections long, a bill which necessarily is largely a matter of detail and form. You want to describe the particular circumstances under which you authorize the larger homestead. A motion is made to suspend the rules and pass the bill, with no opportunity for anyone, except the mover of the motion, to offer an amendment, not even to correct the grammar of the bill, and it is seriously in need of correction, a bill that has a privileged status, could have been called up in the House any day since May 6 last when it was reported. It does not require to be considered by unanimous consent. It does not require a motion to suspend the rules to consider it. The Committee on Public Lands any day, except on Calendar Wednesday or possibly unanimous-consent day, could move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill, because the rules provide—Rule XI, paragraph 56:

The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated. The Committee on Rules, etc. The Committee on the Public Lands—

And among other things—

And bills for the reservation of public lands for the benefit of actual and bona fide settlers.

Under that rule all bills relating to homesteads and providing for homesteads are privileged, and yet the Committee on the Public Lands bring in a bill covering 12 sections, necessarily in the main a matter of detail, propose to suspend the rules and pass it, with no chance for amendment, with only 20 minutes' debate on a side, to give 640 acres of land as a homestead. No one can read this bill and tell what it means. The first provision in the bill is that this homestead shall not exist unless the land is of such a character that 640 acres are reasonably required for the support of a family. If 630 acres will support a family, this bill will not apply. It does not apply unless the Secretary says that 640 acres are reasonably required for the support of a family.

Then the bill goes on and provides that if 641 acres are necessary for the support of a family, this bill will not apply. The Secretary, under the terms of the bill, if he finds a piece of land where 639 acres will support a family, this bill does not apply. Or if he finds 641 acres are necessary to support a family, this bill does not apply. Well, gentlemen will say, of course, the Secretary will not draw the line that fine. He does not know how large the family is to be.

Now, my distinguished friend from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] might be able to live on 640 acres and support his family while the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] would not be able to support his family, because the size of the families is very different. Yet under the terms of this bill the Secretary is required to make a finding which no man on earth can truthfully make. What is the use of imposing duties upon an executive officer which he can not perform and which it is not intended he shall perform?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Now, for instance, we can not amend this bill, and yet it would be vastly improved if you could insert, on page 2, line 2, after the word "crops," the words "and which," because without those words it does not make sense. The bill was drafted in the Land Office, but in printing it the Committee on Public Lands probably did not read it very carefully, and they left out a pronoun which is absolutely required to make sense. Yet we can not offer an amendment to perfect it, notwithstanding that the Committee on Public Lands, any day when Congress has been or is to be in session, did have and would have the privilege of calling this bill up for consideration as a matter of high privilege, having it considered in the Committee of the Whole, where there was a chance to perfect it by offering amendments, but the committee is evidently afraid to expose the bill to critical analysis. Hence it directs its Member in charge of the bill to move to suspend the rules and pass it without knowledge, without amendment, without real consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back any time I may have left.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentlemen on the other side to use some of their time.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]. How much time did I use?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman used three minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think I will use the time allotted. The gentleman from Illinois, with his ingenious mind, calls the attention of the House to the supposition that the Public Lands Committee can march in and take possession of the House with this or with any other bill that they have reported.

I think it is scarcely necessary to say that the Committee on Public Lands would not carry on any such proceeding as that, even if the rules would technically say we had the right.

The Public Lands Committee has many matters before it, some of little consequence and some important, but it does not feel it has the right to come in here and take advantage of some technical rule, and it has not done it in the past under this or any other administration. Neither has the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON] been selfish, grasping, or penurious with his bill.

The gentleman from New Mexico has gone down in defeat while working for the people of his State. He has been working in season and out to get up this bill. No man could have been more diligent. No man deserves more credit for his zealous and untiring efforts. It is not necessary for me to state that when a man comes into this House with a bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar he approaches a perilous course. The Speaker has generously agreed to recognize the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON] to-day to call up this bill under suspension, and very properly so, as I believe.

As the public land dwindles away, and the good land is taken up, and the rocky and the hilly dry land is left, Congress is occasionally asked to modify the homestead laws. You can not go out on a sand dune or a bald knob without a stake or a blade of grass on it, and a family can not exist on 160 acres of such land.

I want the gentleman from Illinois to search into the innermost recesses of his heart and see if he can not put some of his patriotism into this bill as he did into the bill of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] a moment ago. The gentleman from Illinois has great influence in this House; he is the leader of a great party here, and he probably will be a candidate for leader in a greater capacity, and I hope he will; but I urge the gentleman from Illinois and his colleagues who sit about him, and I urge the colleagues of my friend FERGUSSON on this side of the House, not to turn their back on a law that will absolutely settle and populate the West. I ask, then, to pass a bill to-day that is workable, that is practical, and that will help the West.

Let me call the attention of the House to what Congress is being asked to do in another bill that has already passed the Senate, and it is being seriously urged in my committee. They ask to let land be taken up without any residence at all on the ground that they can not get water. Two States in previous Congresses have already been granted that right. I stood in the Public Lands Committee during the Congresses and opposed that proceeding. I am opposed to it now. I am in favor of letting the arid sections of the Rocky Mountain States, where it requires land for pasturage, perchance a little valley, on which to raise the various forage crops—fedrietta, alfalfa, Soudan grass, and others—be actually settled and not prove a failure.

They can not live and they can not stay on 160 acres of this dry, arid land. They can not live and they can not stay on 320 acres of this sort of land. But if you will give them an area large enough so that they can have, perchance, 10 dairy cows or 5 dairy cows, or perchance they can find a little valley with a little well water with which they can irrigate, or a little valley that will raise something without irrigation, and enable them to produce a little forage which they can put into a silo I think the West can be settled.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] called attention to the fact that although his State had been admitted into the Union 50 years they had only 80,000 population. Why, my own county in the State of Oklahoma has almost as much population as that. Think of it! Eighty thousand people in an entire State. No one can stay on the land under the present law. No arable or irrigable land or mineral land is to be settled under this bill; no land in any section of the country where they have rainfall enough to raise enough to live on can be homesteaded under this bill. But this bill will cause what? It will cause the Secretary of the Interior, the Geological Survey, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to pick out a lot of high, dry, nonagricultural grazing land, and it will give 640 acres to a man and his family to live upon. Does anyone longer desire a State that has been admitted into the Union 50 years to be held down to a population of 80,000? This is a good bill. The West needs it. It will help produce more foodstuffs and enable people to get food more cheaply. It should have been passed long ago. I am proud to see it up for consideration. I want it to pass. It deserves to pass. The West will appreciate it. I ask the House to pass it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I can not agree with the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands that this bill relates only to lands on which nothing can be grown. If that were the fact, it would be meaningless and of no value to consider it in this House at all. But because I believe you are going to enlarge the homestead entries on lands that residents in any State might see fit to locate upon, and to grant to those who have already exercised their homestead rights additional land upon which to locate, is the reason I am against this bill.

I do not think the time has arrived for the inauguration of a policy on the part of the National Government to enlarge homesteads generally from 160 to 640 acres. In 10 years' time we have seen that idea develop from the well-known Kinkaid Act, which applied only to arid lands, until now it is proposed to be extended to lands that are capable of agriculture.

Because land is suitable for grazing it does not follow that it is not suitable for agriculture. If you will read this bill closely throughout, you will find that every endeavor is being made to add to the domain of those who have homesteaded the addition of 480 acres. If the homestead entryman has 160 acres, he can go and locate an additional 480 acres within 10 miles of the original tract. If there is no such compact tract within 10 miles of the original tract, he can go foraging around and take to that extent in little strips. He might appropriate under the provisions of this bill all the various scattered tracts of land that might contain watercourses. The gentlemen on the other side shake their heads, but as I read this bill it may be subject to such entry. You do not limit them.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I yield. I wish to be notified, Mr. Speaker, when five minutes have elapsed.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Is the gentleman personally familiar with the land that is described here?

Mr. STAFFORD. I tried to get some information about it. There is nothing here that says "arid" lands. It says lands described as suitable for stock raising. Now, stock-raising lands are grazing lands, and grazing lands may be suitable for agriculture.

Mr. HAYDEN. He can go only 10 miles.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then section 11 of the bill has some provisions relating to coal entries. What connection have stock-raising lands with coal entries? You are legalizing coal entries by this bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is a reenactment of other laws heretofore passed, providing for the surface entry, merely, of land containing coal and minerals.

Mr. STAFFORD. This provision goes further than that. It does not merely reserve to the Government the coal and mineral lands thereon, but specially grants the right to enter, and approves of those entries.

Mr. HAYDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. Read the language and you will see that it will bear that construction. I am one of those coming from the Middle West, where we have large numbers of people who want to go upon the public domain. All the available public land has not been exhausted——

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Is the gentleman speaking now of section 10?

Mr. STAFFORD. Section 11.

Mr. FERRIS. Did the gentleman observe that the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON], on the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], added an amendment which made it clear that when a homestead was taken it had to be of the character designated in this bill—a stock-raising homestead?

Mr. STAFFORD. I remember that amendment was suggested.

Mr. FERRIS. It was embodied in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is too important a bill to be considered without the privilege of amendment. You are crowding this through here, taking away the rights of the great majority of the people to locate on the public lands that are now available and permitting all who have heretofore homesteaded to enter upon an additional 480 acres without paying anything for the additional land. I protest against that policy.

Mr. FERRIS. We are not taking away anything.

Mr. STAFFORD. You are taking away the privilege that my people now have to homestead this land, and conferring a second homestead entry of 480 acres of grazing land adjacent to their present homesteads. This is for the benefit of the entrymen in the Western States, and not for the benefit of the people in the rest of the country.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the gentleman kindly tell me how a man can enter public land without going West?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, a statement was made here by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] that I, as a member of the Public Lands Committee, am obliged to resent. He stated that our committee had adopted the policy of recognizing only two bills for national parks, the bill of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and the bill of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], both members of the Public Lands Committee. The gentleman from Oregon, in connection with that statement, said that he had gone before a subcommittee of the Public Lands Committee to recommend a certain bill for the State of Oregon, and by that subcommittee he was told that that bill would not be considered and that no other bills than these two would be considered. The gentleman from Oregon has since informed me personally that that event happened in a previous Congress, when the bill of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] was not under consideration. I make this statement here and now because I feel it is due to the Public Lands Committee to have it known that they are not playing favorites. They have tried to do their duty by the membership of the House, to take up all questions concerning the public domain, irrespective of whether the bills were brought in by members of the committee or by others. I make this statement to repel false aspersions of recalcitrance to our duty or of favoritism.

Mr. FERRIS. I did not hear the statement of the gentleman from Oregon and do not know what he said. Did the gentleman from Oregon say he was seriously pressing some bill now that the committee had slighted?

Mr. KENT. I understood his statement would lead to the belief that a bill he was pressing was put aside in the interest of these two bills.

Mr. FERRIS. That was some park bill?

Mr. KENT. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Oregon has not been pressing any bill recently to the chairman of this committee, has he?

Mr. LAFFERTY. If the gentleman from California refers to me, I never heard of these two bills until to-day.

Mr. FERRIS. I did not know what the incident was, and all I desire to say is that I do not recall any Member of the Oregon delegation or the Washington delegation recently pressing any park bill. If they have done so, I have forgotten it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Mexico has 11 minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin has 7 minutes.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. STAFFORD. And I yield two minutes additional to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, when I presented the 320-acre homestead bill to the House some years ago I said that the next evolution in homestead law would be in the nature of a grazing homestead bill. A short time after that I introduced a grazing homestead bill. Now we have before us such a bill, called a stock-raising homestead bill. I am in favor of the legislation suggested in this bill. I very much regret, however, that the bill was not brought up in the way that it could have been brought up, and in which the House has heretofore considered the same kind of legislation, so that we could have an opportunity to debate it and amend it. I regret that that was not done, because I do not like the form of the legislation. While I am in favor of good grazing or stock-raising homestead bill, whatever you may call it, I do not like the provisions of this bill. I do not like the provisions of the bill with the complete mineral reservation, which is not clear, and I am sure would not be satisfactory. There are other provisions of the bill that, in my opinion, could be wisely amended; but if it is a question of passing the bill or not passing the bill, I am in favor of legislation of this character, and therefore shall vote for the bill with all of its failings and imperfections. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, this is a good bill, and I am sure if its provisions are understood there will not be a vote against it. The bill authorizes any person qualified to make entry under the homestead laws of the United States to make a stock-raising homestead entry for not exceeding 640 acres of land that shall theretofore have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as "stock-raising lands."

Section 2 of the bill authorizes the Secretary to designate or classify lands subject to entry under the bill, which limits the entry to the surface and provides that the land must be chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops, not containing merchantable timber and not susceptible of irrigation, and that 640 acres are reasonably required for the support of a family.

Section 3 prescribes that the lands entered must be in compact form and that title can be secured by compliance with the terms of the homestead laws, except that instead of cultivation the entryman shall be required to make permanent improvements upon the land before final proof is submitted, tending to increase the value of the same for stock-raising purposes, of the value of not less than $1.25 per acre, and that at least one-half of such improvements shall be placed upon the land within three years after the date of entry.

Section 4 provides that an entryman who has an existing entry of 160 acres or less shall have the right to file upon contiguous lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act to the extent of an area equaling 640 acres, including his original entry.

Section 5 provides that one who has submitted final proof or received patent for lands of the character subject to entry under the terms of this bill, who owns and resides upon the land so acquired, may make additional entry for contiguous lands which, together with the area theretofore acquired, shall not exceed 640 acres.

Section 6 provides that where there are not contiguous lands in area sufficient to complete an entry of 640 acres the entryman or patentee shall have the right to enter, within a radius of 10 miles from his entry, lands in reasonably compact form designated for entry under the provisions of this bill that shall, together with the first entry, not exceed 640 acres.

Section 7 authorizes a person who has made an entry or submitted proof to relinquish or reconvey to the United States his land and make an entry in the same land district of 640 acres under the terms of this bill.

Section 8 provides that the commutation provisions of the homestead laws shall not apply to entries made under this act.

Section 9 gives entrymen or patentees entitled to an additional entry a 30 days' preference right to make an additional entry and also provides for how it shall be determined who is entitled to a tract where there are two claimants.

Section 10 provides that any person who has acquired title under the homestead laws and who is the owner and occupant of the land so acquired may purchase not exceeding 320 acres of stock-raising land at $1.25 per acre.

Section 11 reserves the mineral in lands entered and patented under the terms of this act and provides how the mineral deposits may be disposed of.

Section 12 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make rules and regulations for carrying the terms of the law into effect.

The original homestead law under which the public lands in the humid sections of the United States have been entered and acquired permit an entryman to file upon 160 acres as the maximum area that can be entered, the original theory of the law being that by reason of favorable climatic conditions and the productiveness of the soil 160 acres is sufficient to enable a settler with a family to live comfortably. I mention this because that is the correct theory upon which laws for the disposition of the public domain ought to be constructed. It is this theory that justifies the enactment of the pending bill, and I think I can demonstrate it. Some years ago Congress recognized that the homestead unit of 160 acres ought not to be adopted in all instances; in the irrigation act the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to fix the amount of land that can be entered, the maximum being 160 acres, and he may limit the amount that can be entered to only 40 acres. This limitation is because with the aid of water in arid localities lands may be irrigated and cultivated in the most intensive manner and several crops can be produced during the year.

In the Fifty-seventh Congress there was enacted what is known as the Kinkaid law (act of Apr. 28, 1904, 33 Stat., 547), which is limited in its application to a portion of western Nebraska. This act permits the entry of not exceeding 640 acres. The Kinkaid Act clearly recognizes the necessity of providing that a settler should have a greater area of grazing or arid land, especially nonirrigable, than a settler locating in a humid section on land susceptible of successful grain raising without irrigation. The Kinkaid law was predicated upon the suggestion of the President in his message to Congress at the opening of the second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, in which he said:

Moreover, the approaching exhaustion of the public ranges has of late led to much discussion as to the best manner of using these public lands in the West which are suitable chiefly or only for grazing. The sound and steady development of the West depends upon the building up of homes therein. Much of our prosperity as a nation has been due to the operation of the homestead law. On the other hand, we should recognize the fact that in the grazing region the man who corresponds to the homesteader may be unable to settle permanently if only allowed to use the same amount of pasture land that his brother, the homesteader, is allowed to use of arable land. One hundred and sixty acres of fairly rich and well-watered soil, or a much smaller amount of irrigated land, may keep a family in plenty, whereas no one could get a living from 160 acres of dry pasture land capable of supporting at the outside only one head of cattle to every 10 acres.

Recognizing that in the intermountain States there are areas not susceptible to raising crops under the ordinary methods of farming, but which will, through the adoption of conserving the moisture by certain cultivation known as dry farming, produce profitable crops, Congress enacted what are known as the enlarged homestead laws of February 19, 1909 (35 Stat., 639), and June 17, 1910 (36 Stat., 531), under which acts not exceeding 320 acres may be entered as a homestead. It will be seen by the laws just cited that Congress has repeatedly recognized what I have already stated, that the original homestead laws are not applicable to portions of the public domain and that new laws are necessary to apply to portions of the country where none of the existing laws are applicable, and give the settler who may go upon such lands a fair chance to succeed.

The Assistant Secretary of the Interior, in his report to the chairman of the Public Lands Committee on the pending bill, commenting upon the success of the Kinkaid Act and the other enlarged homestead laws that I have referred to, said:

The settlement, home-making, and agricultural development which followed the enactment of these laws is well known and need not be here described.

With relation to the necessity for legislation, as proposed by this bill, the Assistant Secretary said:

There remain, however, as indicated, vast areas of the public lands to which none of the foregoing laws seem well adapted, and I am of opinion that the time has arrived when a new form of homestead law should be enacted peculiarly adapted thereto. The lands I have in mind, because of their arid or semiarid character, or because of their location on mountain tops or sides, will not produce agricultural crops for sale or exportation in sufficient quantities to justify acquirement thereof and residence thereon under the existing laws. They do, however, possess some value for grazing purposes and often include tracts of greater or less extent upon which might be grown forage crops, such as Kafir corn, milo maize, fodder, or other rough feed, of little value for sale and transportation, but valuable for winter feed or for the fattening of range stock. I believe that with this class of lands a homestead of 640 acres of land would enable bona fide homeseekers to establish and maintain homes for the purpose of stock raising and for such farming operations as will enable him to raise their own supply of rough feed for the stock pastured upon the remaining lands entered or acquired.

After the subject had been fully and carefully considered by the Public Lands Committee and after exhaustive hearings had been held, the committee approved the present bill precisely as it is presented here, and it was submitted to the Secretary of the Interior for a report, and the Assistant Secretary, in a letter to the chairman of the committee, under date of April 24, 1914, said:

As stated in my letter to you of January 30, 1914, I am heartily in favor of legislation which will permit and encourage the settlement and development of public lands to which the present homestead laws are not adapted, but which, under a somewhat more liberal measure, would be settled upon, improved, and developed for the purpose of stock raising.

He suggested a couple of amendments to the bill, and their adoption is included in the pending motion to suspend the rules.

I want to read a statement made by Mr. I. S. Bartlett, of Cheyenne, Wyo., that appears in the hearings upon this bill, as to the necessity for this legislation and the benefits that would result from it. Mr. Bartlett said:

A grazing homestead bill giving 640 acres, or even 2 sections, to each settler would soon add 200 per cent to the live-stock production of the public-land States and solve the beef problem for the next half century. Not only that, it would break down the high prices of beef, pork, and mutton, as well as dairy products.

Better than all, it would settle up the vast area of waste lands in the Nation with a hardy, intelligent, and progressive American citizenship.

Think for a moment what our desert or grass ranges will produce, situated, as they are, in an environment of mountains and plains and flooded with sunshine.

Here are some purely range products: Cattle, sheep, horses, hogs, goats, hides, wool, butter, cheese, milk and dairy products, poultry, and eggs. All these can be produced in our native grass regions without any plowing or land cultivation.

The irrigated and dry farms in the same section will supplement all the needed fattening and forage crops, and both the farming and stock-raising interests will be mutually and correspondingly benefited.

The range homestead proposition can be easily worked out. Instead of the requirements of plowing up the land and crop cultivation, the law should require expenditure for sinking wells, building of sheds and corrals, the possession of a certain number of animals, etc. The residence requirements should be the same as in other homestead acts.

In nearly every section of the grass ranges water can be found at depths varying from 20 to 500 feet. In many cases artesian water and flowing wells are obtained, giving a sufficient supply of water for irrigating many acres and raising fine crops. With the passage of a grazing homestead bill the so-called desert lands would be penetrated with wells and the whole landscape dotted with windmills and improvements in the form of houses, barns, corrals, and fences.

In a very few years a wonderful transformation scene would be enacted in the vast cattle ranges of the West, now practically uninhabited by settlers. That this is no dream has already been demonstrated by the results of the Kinkead 640-acre homestead act, which applied to the desert wastes of western Nebraska. That entire section is now settled up with a high class of prosperous and successful farmers. Five million acres of arid lands have been reclaimed there, and the wave of incoming settlers has overflowed into Wyoming in the search for dry-farming lands.

Even under the late repressive land administration the Commissioner of the General Land Office advocated the 640-acre homestead for the semiarid West, and in so doing stated that "the largest part of the unappropriated public domain would never pass to private ownership under smaller allotments."

Local bills are good enough so far as they go, but the whole subject should be treated from a national point of view and a bill passed applicable to all the States having public lands.

It is interesting to note what Maj. J. W. Powell, Director of the United States Geological Survey, said in 1879 with relation to the necessity for legislation permitting the entry of more than 160 acres of grazing land. Here is his statement:

THE FARM UNIT FOR PASTURAGE LANDS.

The grass is so scanty that the herdsman must have a large area for the support of his stock. In general, a quarter section of land alone is of no value to him. The pasturage it affords is entirely inadequate to the wants of a herd that the poorest man needs for his support (p. 21).

Four square miles may be considered as the minimum amount necessary for a pasturage farm, and a still greater amount is necessary for the larger part of the lands; that is, pasturage farms, to be of any practical value, must be of at least 2,560 acres, and in many districts they must be much larger (p. 22).

Hon. Charles D. Walcott, who for many years was the Director of the United States Geological Survey, in a communication to the Secretary of the Interior concerning the Kinkaid bill, among other things said:

The central idea of this bill is that of enlarging the area of homestead entry to suit the conditions of the semiarid West. There is general recognition of the fact that the present land laws, designed for the humid region, are not applicable to the arid region.

* * * * * * *

The arbitrary limit stated by the present land laws of 160 acres for a homestead does not suit existing conditions in the arid region. If the water supply is ample, 160 acres is usually far too much, and would support two, three, or four families; on the other hand, throughout 90 to 95 per cent of the vast extent of remaining public land 160 acres is so small as to be useless for a homestead.

No general rule as to what shall constitute a homestead can be laid down. In order to determine this matter local knowledge must be had and exercised in the same manner as it is under the reclamation projects. The question is one largely of altitude, climate, and water supply, rather than extent of land.

There can be no hard and fast rule as to the limits to be set for such land, but knowledge of the water supply and judgment may be used if the arid lands are to be divided into tracts capable of supporting a family. Under the operation of the laws at present in force there is no possibility of equity in the matter. Men take their chances of getting enough land one way or another. If they fail, they sell or relinquish their rights to their neighbors until an adjustment is finally attained, at great cost and hardship, and without attaining the best results for the Commonwealth, since in the general laxity of affairs the lands are not put to the best use, and many of them gradually pass into the hands of corporations instead of being utilized for the support of independent families.

I might go on discussing at much length the necessity for legislation for the disposition of lands of the character intended to be affected by this bill so as to induce settlers to go upon them and acquire homes and under conditions that would enable them to succeed and live comfortably, but being convinced that enough has been said to justify the passage of the bill, and having explained its different provisions in detail, I will conclude with a hope that the motion to suspend the rules will prevail and that the bill will be passed.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I also yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, no more important measure has been before Congress for consideration for many years. I do not believe that in all the history of the country a single piece of national legislation was ever passed that has resulted in greater good to the entire people than the homestead law of 1862. This bill, after very full consideration and very full hearings and with all the light up to date on this great homestead question, has been drafted, and the purpose of it is to adapt the fundamental principles of the homestead law to the conditions surrounding the remaining public lands.

Of course, the exact test as to what ought to be the size of the homestead which the Government offers to citizens who will go out upon and open up a new country and make it fit for civilization is the area that will enable an industrious man to support a family. That was the rule adopted as to the 160-acre homestead law, and it worked well in the Missouri and the Mississippi Valleys, but we have gone way beyond the point where 160 acres in area of our remaining public lands without irrigation, can support a family. The area here, 640 acres, has been fixed as the result of experience. This particular bill has been drafted by the Interior Department itself, and I differ from my friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] in his view as to whether it has been well prepared. It would have been proper if the bill, considering its importance, could have been considered for general amendment, and still I believe that the bill in its present form is about as good as could be drafted, with all the intelligence and information we have on this great subject up to the present time.

We undertook many years ago—10 years ago, indeed—to pass a section homestead law for the remaining public lands in western South Dakota. We passed it through this House, but it failed in the Senate because we were near the adjournment of Congress at that time. Impelled in part by the fact that that movement had life and agitation in Congress, two great railways built across that country and settlers poured into that semiarid area and took 160-acre homesteads; but the result has been, from practical experience, that many of those who went there have now gone away, while those who remain occupy practically 640 acres each and are making a living upon it. Consult the census and you will find that in Iowa, for instance, with rich lands and ample rainfall, about 160 acres are now the unit of farm area—one hundred and fifty-six and a fraction.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, is it not a fact that in certain portions of the West 640 acres are not sufficient?

Mr. MARTIN. That is true. There are portions of the West where that is not sufficient, and it is the duty of the Secretary of the Interior under this bill to leave out those general areas from classification and to put in classification only those portions of grazing lands where 640 acres can be reasonably expected to support a family. In South Dakota the average farm unit is three hundred and thirty-five and a fraction acres; in North Dakota, 382; in Montana, 516; and in Wyoming, 777. We have never had a land monopoly in this country, and we never will have so long as Congress remains wise enough to provide farm homestead units upon which men can make a living. It is only when we are negligent in that respect that the lands are liable to fall into monopoly.

A large number of homesteads have been made in the semiarid West in the past few years. To the extent that they have become permanent, it is well known that the settlers are not supporting themselves on 160 acres of land. They are depending upon large areas of open range for their stock, and without this could not exist under present conditions. The native grass of the range country is being rapidly destroyed under the careless and wasteful methods of the open range. These vast areas of public lands are not subject to taxation and make no contribution to local self-government.

A good stock country is a wealthy country when properly stocked and used for the purposes for which it is best adapted. A section of these lands, properly protected and utilized, in the ownership of an industrious citizen may support a family. To limit the settler to 160 acres is to invite disaster.

It is the duty of the Government to offer the homesteader sufficient land that his battle on the frontier may not be a losing one. This legislation will take us a long step in the right direction. It will provide comfortable homes for thousands of our worthy citizens, who in turn will build up local communities and add millions of value to the combined wealth of the Nation.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID].

[Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] for one minute.

[Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

[Mr. RAKER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. FERGUSSON. I now yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, this bill, commonly known as the Fergusson 640-acre homestead bill, is the product of months of hard work by the Committee on the Public Lands. Exhaustive hearings were held, and the committee was favored by the testimony of men thoroughly familiar with every phase of the live-stock and dry-farming industries of the West. Three different drafts of this measure were considered by the committee, and the bill before you represents the collective judgment of its members as to what ought to be done in order to promote the settlement of large areas of the public domain.

Like most bills that come before this House, this proposed act is a compromise. I have not been a Member of this body very long, but I have served here a sufficient time to learn that we can not expect to have legislation passed that is entirely satisfactory to our constituents. This is particularly true of the Congressmen from the public-land States, because we must submit our measures for decision to the membership of the House, a majority of whom never saw an acre of the public domain and have no conception of the difficulties under which the homesteader is compelled to labor.

I betray no secrets when I say that there was a serious disagreement in the Committee on the Public Lands when this proposition was first considered. The bill as originally drawn made available for entry as "grazing homesteads" all lands designated by the Secretary of the Interior "the surface of which is, in his opinion, chiefly valuable for grazing, which do not contain merchantable timber, and which are not susceptible of irrigation from any known source of water supply." Immediate objection was made to this provision by a number of the members of the committee, upon the ground that it would permit speculation in large areas of land by entrymen who were not seeking in good faith to obtain homes, but who would make entries in order to force the stockmen to pay them to move away or to purchase the land after title was obtained from the Government.

Members of the committee who favored this language insisted that a similar provision in the 320-acre homestead law had worked well in actual practice, and that it was no concern of the United States as to what use was made of the land after a patent is issued. They were quite certain that the Department of the Interior could prevent the acceptance of proof made by entrymen who were not acting in good faith.

A compromise was finally agreed upon which requires the Secretary of the Interior to classify the land that is suitable for entry under this act. In addition to the text that I have just read, the Secretary must designate lands that "are of such character that 640 acres are reasonably required for the support of a family," and a proviso was added which reads as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall not designate for entry under this act land of which, owing to its general character or general conditions, in his opinion, 640 acres clearly will not support a family.

This proviso is an innovation in our homestead laws. Heretofore the settler could go upon the most arid, barren, and worthless tract of land imaginable and, if he succeeded in making satisfactory proof of residence and cultivation, title to the area entered would pass to him. The entryman took all the risk and did his own classifying. But under this provision it is made incumbent on the Secretary of the Interior to say that the average settler has a fair chance to make a living on 640 acres of land of such character that it is "chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops."

This new idea was adopted by the committee after much discussion in the belief that it would not only tend to prevent speculation by entrymen who would not act in good faith, but with the further purpose of preventing the location of settlers by land agents in places where they are foredoomed to failure. The committee believed that an attempt by the settler to support his family by grazing live stock and growing forage crops on 640 acres in the semiarid West is, at best, an enterprise of considerable hazard, and for this reason the prospective entryman is entitled to the benefit of the best judgment of the Department of the Interior respecting the probability of his success on the land he desires to enter. Undoubtedly the department will, among other things, give consideration to the annual and seasonal rainfall, the length of the growing season, and the quality of the native grasses in determining the areas to which this act shall apply. The settler in a new country has enough of hardships to contend with, under any circumstances, and he certainly ought to be furnished with every particle of helpful information that the Government has at its command.

I desire to state, Mr. Speaker, that I have heretofore mailed a large number of copies of this bill to my constituents, and that much mention of it has been made in the newspapers of my State. I have received a great many letters from citizens of Arizona urging its passage. Most of the letters, however, are from the counties of Cochise and Santa Cruz in southern Arizona, and from Apache, Navajo, Coconino, and Yavapai Counties in the northern part of the State. I doubt whether the Department of the Interior will find any considerable area of land in the other counties of Arizona where this bill can be made applicable. I am satisfied, however, that its enactment into law will materially promote an increase in the population of the counties that I have mentioned by inducing new settlers to make homes on the public lands located therein.

This bill merits favorable action by the House. It is but a continuation of our present homestead policy, with such changes as experience has demonstrated to be necessary in view of the character and condition of the remainder of the public lands in the West. It will make homes for our citizens; it will create property values that can be taxed to support the State and county governments; it will promote the prosperity and the general welfare of the entire West. This is the only homestead legislation that is obtainable at this time, and I sincerely trust that this measure will become a law during the present session of Congress.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Has the gentleman only one more speech?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. I yield the balance of my time to my colleague [Mr. LENROOT].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I was not in charge of the bill nor was I interested in it any more than I was in any other bill coming from the Committee on the Public Lands, of which I am a member. I want frankly to say it had not occurred to me that this bill was a privileged bill, and if it were not for the fact that it would be impossible, through the inability of the Democratic Party to expedite business and its general incompetency [laughter on the Republican side], to secure consideration of this bill in the regular way during this session, although it is privileged, I would not favor this motion at this time. But we all know that, although privileged as it is, appropriation bills will take all the time of the remaining portion of the session.

Now, with reference to the criticism made on this bill by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. He very severely criticized that provision of the bill which requires the Secretary of the Interior in making designations to designate such land as he shall find that 640 acres are reasonably required for the support of a family, and on the other hand prohibits him from designating land where he believes 640 acres will not support a family. Now, technically, the criticism of the gentleman from Illinois may be correct, but, after all, it is only a direction to the Secretary of the Interior as to what character of land shall be designated by him; and it was the intention, as is clearly seen from a reading of the bill itself, that he must not designate land where 160 acres will support a family or 320 acres will support a family, but where 640 acres are reasonably required to support a family, and in order to prevent inducements being held out to would-be settlers from all over the country that here are 640-acre homesteads in abundance, in order that the entire public domain, much of which is absolutely worthless, will not be held out to them by land agents in the West, we make a limitation upon the other hand also prohibiting the Secretary from including in that designation land where the settler will not have a reasonable chance to make a home and support a family. That is the purpose of the proviso, of the two limitations, one that he shall designate 640 acres that will reasonably support a family, and the other that he shall not designate any land where it certainly will not support a family.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all those who have spoken on the bill may have the privilege of extending their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that those who have spoken on the bill may have the privilege of extending their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, may I make a similar request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object to all of them. If we pass the bill under the suspension of the rules, let us have the RECORD show that we did it without consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman makes the point of order on the vote?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; the vote has been disposed of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned, to meet to-morrow, Tuesday, January 19, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. Letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting list of documents and files of papers of no use in the transaction of the current business of the department and of no permanent or historic interest (H. Doc. No. 1499); to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

2. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting data relative to leasing and renting unoccupied and unproductive property of the United States under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury (H. Doc. No. 1500); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting report as to rents received from properties located on sites of proposed public buildings purchased by the United States Government in the city of Washington (H. Doc. No. 1501); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of the Interior submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for administration and protection of the Yellowstone National Park, caring for buffalo, etc., for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916 (H. Doc. No. 1502); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

5. Letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting certified copy of findings of fact and conclusions in the case of Frances J. Tuyle, remarried widow of Henry F. Jacobs, deceased (H. Doc. No. 1503); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

6. Letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting certified copy of findings of fact and conclusions in the case of E. B. McHenry, receiver of the Bank of West Tennessee (H. Doc. No. 1504); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. STOUT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 3897) to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to revise the location of its right of way, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1292), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 5525) to authorize the President to appoint Maj. William O. Owen, United States Army, retired, a colonel on the active list of the Army, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1291), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12841) granting a pension to Blanche Wood; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 20410) granting a pension to Jennie S. Bunch; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. FERRIS: A bill (H. R. 21007) giving contestants preference right to purchase abandoned entries pursuant to successful contest proceedings, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. BURNETT (by request): A bill (H. R. 21008) to further regulate the entrance of Chinese aliens into the United States; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. GUERNSEY: A bill (H. R. 21009) to make Van Buren, Me., a port through which merchandise may be imported for transportation without appraisement; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ADAIR: A bill (H. R. 21010) granting an increase of pension to George Gardiner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BARNHART: A bill (H. R. 21011) granting an increase of pension to James P. Strickler; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CRAMTON: A bill (H. R. 21012) granting an increase of pension to Harriet Vosburg; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DALE: A bill (H. R. 21013) granting an increase of pension to Frances M. Hammond; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DONOHOE: A bill (H. R. 21014) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Macdonald; to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 19, 1915.

(Legislative day of Friday, January 15, 1915.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, there are only about half a dozen Senators present. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Gallinger	Overman	Swanson
Bristow	Hitchcock	Perkins	Thornton
Bryan	Jones	Ransdell	Tillman
Burleigh	Kenyon	Robinson	Townsend
Burton	Kern	Shafroth	Vardaman
Chamberlain	La Follette	Sheppard	Walsh
Clapp	Lane	Simmons	White
Crawford	Lippitt	Smith, Ariz.	Works
Culberson	Martin, Va.	Smith, Mich.
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Fletcher	Myers	Stone

Mr. GRONNA. My colleague [Mr. McCUMBER] is unavoidably absent from the city.

Mr. THORNTON. I was requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] on account of illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CAMDEN, Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. ROOT,

Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names when called.

Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. BORAH, Mr. REED, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. LEE of Maryland entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

EXCISE BOARD OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Out of order, on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], which was agreed to, for the appointment of a committee to examine into the conduct of the excise board of the District of Columbia, the Chair appoints Senators SHEPPARD, JAMES, HITCHCOCK, JONES, and DILLINGHAM.

IMPORT DUTIES COLLECTED AT VERA CRUZ.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 800, Senate resolution 514, which unfortunately went to the calendar the other day instead of being disposed of.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest that the unfinished business, the shipping bill, is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not a doubt of the right to displace the unfinished business, if the Senate shall desire to do so, by a motion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I be heard just a moment? I am sure the Senator from Florida will not oppose my motion. This is a resolution asking for certain information from the President of the United States, information that we ought to have at once. It was before the Senate the other morning in the morning hour, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Discussion on that motion carried the question beyond the morning hour, and under the rules of the Senate it took its place upon the calendar; but it is a matter that ought to be determined one way or the other, and determined at once. I have no desire to interfere with the so-called shipping bill. I am sure that we can dispose of this resolution within a very limited time.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I understand the shipping bill is before the Senate. It was before the Senate when we took a recess, and it is still before the Senate. I should like to know whether a motion is in order to take up any other matter except by displacing the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If this resolution is taken up, it does displace the unfinished business. There never has been a doubt about the right to move to displace the unfinished business by taking up some other business.

Mr. STONE. I think that is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it not a fact that if the resolution were disposed of before the conclusion of the legislative day then the unfinished business would not be displaced, but if it went beyond the legislative day it would be displaced?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The motion clearly is debatable.

Mr. STONE. We have no morning hour, but——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can not rule that the motion is not debatable. The Chair had to withdraw a ruling made the other day. The Chair believes that the rule is that before 2 o'clock the motion is not debatable, but after 2 o'clock it is debatable.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry while I have the floor. We are now, as I understand it, theoretically doing business after 2 o'clock?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. If I remember correctly, the Chair ruled the other day that a motion of this character made after 2 o'clock is debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. STONE. What is it that the Chair rules?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to proceed to the consideration of any subject upon the calendar after 2 o'clock is debatable.

Mr. STONE. But this is not after 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, yes; it is after 2 o'clock of the legislative day of Friday the 15th.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not want to be accused of joining in any effort to unduly delay the disposition of the bill authorizing a shipping board to purchase or build merchant ships. I have no intention of taking up any part of the time of the Senate in laying before it the resolution which I have moved to consider. I only want to remind the Senate lest it shall be forgotten of the character of the resolution.

I have asked in the resolution that the President shall inform the Senate, if it be compatible with the public welfare and interest, concerning certain money collected by the general of the Army while we were in occupation of a part of Mexico, namely, Vera Cruz.

As I am advised, and as was stated the other day by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and I have no doubt with full knowledge, we undertook to enforce the law of Mexico with regard to the collection of import duties at Vera Cruz, and in the enforcement of that law there came into the hands of the general of the Army a large sum of money. It is currently reported, and since the discussion the other day took place I have been more definitely advised, that the customs duties at Vera Cruz had been pledged by a law of the Republic of Mexico to secure certain obligations which had been issued by some Government of Mexico or some Commonwealth or State in the Republic.

This money is now in the hands, so far as I know, of the general of the Army or the Secretary of War or the United States Treasury. I have asked the President in this resolution to inform us with regard to the amount of money so collected; with regard to the pledges created by the laws of Mexico, if he knows what they are; with regard to the claimants for the money in so far as they have made their claims known to the United States; with regard to the holders of these obligations, if their names are known to the Secretary of War or the President; with regard to any changes that have occurred in the ownership of the obligations since we took possession of Vera Cruz, and finally as to the intention of the executive department of the Government in the disposition of the money; that is to say, whether the President or any subordinate officer of the United States intended to make disposition of the money without the action of Congress.

I asserted the other day—and I think I was right about it—that it is for the Congress of the United States to say what shall become of this money. I do not care to enter into a long argument with regard to the authority over the money. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] claimed that the President of the United States could recognize whomsoever he pleased to recognize as the government of Mexico, and could turn this money over to whomsoever he might believe represented to the Republic of Mexico. I do not think that is the law of the United States. I do not think that is within the constitutional power of the President. I want, if I can, to preserve the country from that blunder or mistake, as the case may be.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] moved to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations upon the suggestion that there was something in it that might involve our relations with Mexico. To me he is obviously wrong. We have the money, and if it does require congressional authority to dispose of it, then it can not involve our relations with the Republic of Mexico. I do not know what our relations are with that Republic. There seems to be a great deal of confusion upon that point, and I do not intend to take this occasion to give my own views with regard to what our relations should be. But this resolution presents a very plain, clear case of a request for information to which we are entitled. If the President himself believes that it will be unfair to the executive department or inconsistent with the public interest to give the information, he can, within the terms of the request, decline to give it upon that ground. I can not conceive that the President needs for the exercise of his duty in that respect either the advice or the assistance of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I hope, Mr. President, that the resolution will be taken up. If it once comes before the Senate, I renew my hope that it will be dealt with in the Senate, and without a reference to the committee. Upon the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STONE. I move to lay the motion of the Senator from Iowa on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. After the yeas and nays have been ordered, is it proper for the Senator from Missouri to move to lay the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution on the table?

Mr. STONE. The matter is still open to debate, even after the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true. After the yeas and nays have been ordered the question is open to debate, but it is not open to a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. STONE. I think it is.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Chair rule upon that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would ask the Senator from Utah if there is any precedent upon the subject?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will frankly say that I have not looked into the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Rule XXII provides that—

When a question is pending—

Now, this is a pending question—

When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn.
To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain.
To take a recess.
To proceed to the consideration of executive business.
To lay on the table.
To postpone indefinitely.
To postpone to a day certain.
To commit.
To amend.
Which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

The yeas and nays have been ordered, but that does not cut off debate upon the subject, and the roll call had not begun. The Chair recognizes the importance of the question, but does not see why, under the rule, a motion to lay on the table is not in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Just a word, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be glad to hear the Senator briefly on the question.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize that the motion made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] was a pending question, but the Senator from Iowa asked for the yeas and nays and they were granted. Therefore that question is not a pending question. I have not any doubt that the statement of the Chair is perfectly correct as to the original motion and before the Senator had asked for the yeas and nays; but after the yeas and nays have been granted I do not believe that it is possible, under the rule, to move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, just a moment. I can not bring my mind to agree with the position of the Senator from Utah. I believe that under the rules a motion to lay on the table is in order, and to show that I am not engaged in any effort to postpone or delay the consideration of the shipping bill—I have not enlarged any debate upon the question—I now ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion of the Senator from Missouri to lay my motion on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the request for the yeas and nays seconded?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before that is done I should certainly like to have the Chair rule upon the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled, and would have reversed the ruling if there had been to the mind of the Chair anything in the statement of the Senator from Utah which would have justified him in doing so; but it is well known to every Member of this body that the yeas and nays are very frequently ordered, and that the commencement of the call of the roll does not take place sometimes until 24 hours afterwards.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Meantime Senators rise and discuss the pending question. It can not, therefore, be the rule of the Senate that, if the yeas and nays are ordered, all motions which may be made after the ordering of the yeas and nays are out of order. The Chair does not think there is any doubt on that point.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will permit me, I will say that it is only after the roll call has actually begun that debate can not occur and motions can not intervene. That is not the case when the yeas and nays have merely been ordered. I think an examination of the precedents will disclose the fact that a roll call can not be interrupted for the purpose of debate or to submit a motion, but, as I have said, that does not apply in cases where the yeas and nays have merely been ordered.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to proceed to the consideration of the resolution indicated by him. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who seems to be absent from the Chamber. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who seems to be absent. On that account I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed he has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], and vote "nay."

While I am on my feet I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] is unavoidably absent from the city, but he has a pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. CULBERSON. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the affirmative). I did not observe when I voted that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], with whom I am paired, was out of the Chamber. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and allow my vote to stand. I will ask that this announcement of the transfer of my pair remain for the day.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] has been called from the city on important official business and will not be present to-day.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I desire to inquire if the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed he has not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. COLT (after having voted in the negative). I desire to inquire if the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. COLT. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. HOLLIS (after having voted in the affirmative). When I voted I thought my pair, the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], was in the Chamber. I find that he is not present, and I transfer my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to announce the continued absence of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] on account of sickness in his family. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA].

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—36.

Ashurst	Hughes	Pomerene	Stone
Bankhead	James	Ransdell	Swanson
Bryan	Kern	Reed	Thomas
Chamberlain	Lee, Md.	Robinson	Thompson
Culberson	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Thornton
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Vardaman
Gore	Myers	Simmons	Walsh
Hardwick	Overman	Smith, Ariz.	White
Hollis	Owen	Smith, Ga.	Williams

NAYS—28.

Borah	Cummins	Nelson	Sherman
Brady	Dillingham	Norris	Smoot
Brandegee	Gronna	Oliver	Stephenson
Burton	Jones	Page	Sterling
Catron	La Follette	Perkins	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Lippitt	Poindexter	Weeks
Colt	McLean	Root	Works

NOT VOTING—32.

Bristow	Fall	Lewis	Shields
Burleigh	Gallinger	Lodge	Shively
Camden	Goff	McCumber	Smith, Md.
Chilton	Hitchcock	Newlands	Smith, Mich.
Clapp	Johnson	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Penrose	Sutherland
Crawford	Lane	Pittman	Tillman
du Pont	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	Warren

So the motion of Mr. CUMMINS was laid on the table.

Mr. BRISTOW subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to state that the reason why some of us were not here on the vote was because the Committee on the Philippines, of which we are members, has been engaged in working on the Philippines bill, and it was impossible to be with that committee and to be here at the same time.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia, to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, yesterday I presented to the Senate certain questions which I regard as especially pertinent to this discussion. They are 14 in number and appear on pages 1863 and 1864 of the RECORD. I trust that at an early day the advocates of this bill will answer these questions. Several of them, as it seems to me, present insuperable objections to the adoption of this policy.

I was proceeding with these questions in order yesterday and dwelt upon the first four, and also the seventh, the course of my remarks being somewhat interrupted by questions. I repeat the first four already disposed of:

(1) Will it be the policy of the Government to select a special route for such ships? On what route is a line to be established?

(2) If so, what will be the determining factors in selecting the route?

(3) Will the choice be determined with a view to getting any particular American commodity to market? If so, what product and what will be the determining factors in the selection?

(4) What American port or ports will be adopted as the export and import points and what will be the rule for determining the choice?

It is inevitable that under any such plan as this a comparatively trivial portion of the export and import trade of the United States will be provided for by Government ships. What a serious obstacle arises to this plan, indeed an insuperable obstacle, in the fact that it would be impossible to avoid favoritism in the products selected for carriage and in the selection of ports from which the boats may ply.

I come now to the fifth question: Will the desire to build up new trade be the determining factor? If so, how will this be accomplished?

Mr. President, I have been surprised, not to say amazed, by the arguments used by the advocates of this bill in regard to the promotion of trade. They have said: "Trade follows the flag." They have called attention to the fact that in a greater or less degree the owners of ships enter into conferences in regard to rates, sailing schedules, and routes. They have added to this the statement that the control of these steamboat lines is determined by the desire of the foreign owners, corporations or individuals, to reap profits from the shipping trade.

Those arguments have a very familiar sound. They have been used in this Chamber and in the House for 20 years in support of ship subsidies. They have also been used in support of extreme ideas in favor of a protective tariff. If we are to be influenced by these last two arguments—that conferences and combinations occur, and that the dominating feature in the management of foreign shipping is the desire for profit—how can you escape the argument for a high protective tariff in this country?

What is the controlling motive of manufacturers in foreign lands who manufacture products competing with those of our mills and factories? Is it altruism? No; it is the desire to obtain the largest possible share of the American market, which is admittedly the best and broadest in the world. If that is a valid argument why the Government should go into the shipping business, it is also an unanswerable argument why we should build a tariff wall so high that no foreign producer could come over it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want the Senator from Ohio to feel entirely free to say to me, if he desires to do so, that he would rather pursue the argument he is now making than to turn aside for a moment to answer the question I desire to put.

Mr. BURTON. I am quite willing to answer questions at this point. There are some portions of the argument on which I should desire not to be interrupted, but at this time I am entirely willing.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a very interesting feature about this bill, very intimately connected with the point which the Senator from Ohio is now making.

This business is to be done by a private corporation, not by the Government. It is to be done by a corporation organized under the laws of either a State, the District of Columbia, or the United States, but, nevertheless, a private corporation, in which the Government is a stockholder. Now, suppose the Government becomes a stockholder in the corporation that is to engage in trade with foreign countries. We will assume that it is a majority stockholder, because that is provided for. Suppose private capital comes in to take the remainder of the stock. Assume that Kuhn, Loeb & Co. were to subscribe for the $4,900,000 of the stock which the Government is not required to take. A minority stockholder has rights in a corporation which the majority can not ignore. The only right of a majority stockholder, under the laws of most of the States, is to elect a board of directors; and the board of directors then manage the corporation and must manage the corporation for the equal benefit of all the stockholders.

Suppose that this corporation proposed to enter upon a trade such as the Senator from Ohio has just been considering, plainly unprofitable, but plainly for the benefit of all the people of the country, either in the way of opening up new trade or in the way of reducing rates below the cost of operation in an old established trade. The Senator is arguing the case upon the assumption that the corporation would have the right to do that, would have the right to confer this advantage upon the whole people by doing business at less than cost or without any profit, just as we confer these privileges upon those who produce commodities in this country in competition with producers abroad.

Does the Senator believe that the minority stockholders would permit a corporation so organized to engage in business simply to benefit the people of the country, and which would exhaust and destroy the capital which they had invested in the business? Plainly not. Any court in the land would enjoin the corporation from proceeding in that way, where its avowed purpose was the general benefit of the whole country, and not the profit of the individual stockholder.

Mr. BURTON. I am obliged to the Senator from Iowa for the suggestion. I have regarded that point as of sufficient importance to make it the subject of a separate question, which I believe is the very next in my list, No. 6. I had intended to discuss that subject somewhat fully, but I fear that I can add very little to what the Senator from Iowa has so excellently said.

Of course, it is probable that no individual subscriber would be found for any part of this 49 per cent. If there were any subscriptions from outside, it is quite probable they would be made for the sake of embarrassment. The manifest object of this scheme is so utterly alien to the ordinary purpose for which corporations are formed that no one can be imagined as subscribing for any of the stock from an ordinary business motive. I shall come to that later.

Why, Mr. President, in 1913 we heard the loudest denunciation of combinations ever heard in this country. Men were called "standpatters" and "reactionaries" who stood for the idea that the Government should foster American industry. Our eyes were blindfolded to the plain fact that this is an age of large-scale operations, that practically every foreign country having a leading position in industry and commerce has its combinations. Germany has its cartels. It makes legal and binding selling associations which seek to control the whole of the output of a particular article. By every means in the power of the Government these organizations are aided. Preferential rates are given on the State railroads. Preferential rates are given on privately owned steamship lines. Sales are frequently made abroad at less than the price at home, no doubt at less than the cost of production. We were asked to close our eyes to all this and to enforce in this country the severest rules against combinations. Any corporation which sold abroad for less than at home was visited with criticism and objurgation.

It was from motives of this sort that you passed the Underwood-Simmons Act of 1913, recognizing that foreign profits would be increased by the opening of our markets to them, and demanding that no combinations should be allowed to exist in the United States. But now, in the year 1915, what a change. Because profits are reaped by foreigners, because they combine in shipping agreements which, if necessary anywhere, are necessary in this business of transportation, the Government must go into the business.

What an abounding versatility and capacity for turning mental somersaults this shows in the party in power! Why did you not make this argument in 1913? Why did you not recognize in that year the fact that business was carried on abroad for the profit of manufacturers and shippers? Why this belated conversion to the idea that we must enter upon this untried experiment, so fraught with danger and probability of disaster, because the foreigner, according to the general rules of business, is determining the course of his shipping by the expectation of profit?

Mr. President, I never have had extreme ideas on the tariff question. I think our domestic policy should undertake to repress monopoly. I think that gradually, decade by decade, we can reform our tariff, working toward lower rates and a limited free list. But if the principles which you are adopting, on which you base your argument for this bill, are to be accepted by the American people, our tariff rates must continue indefinitely at the highest altitude. The whole idea of trade, as advocated by those who favor the removal of restrictions on imports, is that of a division of labor. It is maintained that if another country can bring a certain product to our markets at a lower price than that at which our producers can sell it, they should be allowed to do so; that we should turn our attention to lines of enterprise in which we have a natural advantage. I do not altogether accept that doctrine. There are considerations of national sufficiency and of industrial development which should apply. And I believe, again, that in order to make these theories of free trade practicable in any one country they must be adopted by all countries. We can not open our markets to the products of other nations unless they show the spirit of reciprocity and open the door for our trade.

I trust before we are through those who have proposed this bill, those who are saying they are going to vote for it, those who say they have a sufficient number of Senators to pass it through will explain this inconsistency: Why are you adopting as a guiding principle of legislation in 1915 a doctrine which you indignantly rejected in the year 1913?

One of the chief arguments for this bill is that if we have more ships and establish new routes our trade will be increased. To a limited extent, Mr. President, I admit the truth of that contention, but the course of trade is largely determined by other considerations. In this connection I take the liberty to present again to the Senate some remarks which I made here in January, 1911. These were made when no ship-purchase bill was pending, when these questions were not arising except in an indirect way, so that I think no accusation can be made, as might possibly be the case now, that I was using them for the purpose of defeating an administration measure. They were made at a time when a so-called ship subsidy bill was pending.

I begin to read on page 1174, this being the RECORD of January 20, 1911, four years ago. I take the liberty to read this because I think perhaps it was prepared more carefully than I could prepare it now. In the language of Dean Swift, "How well I could write when I was a young man."

"Mr. President, the fundamental question in this discussion is what conditions determine the course of trade. The argument usually presented in behalf of such measures as this is that trade follows the flag or that trade follows a subsidized merchant marine. On the fallacy of these claims I desire to address myself at some length.

In order to understand this question, it is necessary to examine into the factors which determine commerce. Trade between nations, as between individuals, depends upon the ability to satisfy a want or a desire more cheaply and more efficiently than a competitor can. A nation will be a large buyer if it is possessed of great wealth. There must not only be a demand for commodities to satisfy wants, but this demand must be accompanied by purchasing power.

"Nothing more clearly illustrates the rules governing trade than the contrasted conditions in Great Britain and in the United States. Great Britain is an extremely wealthy country and does not have within its own borders that supply of food and raw materials necessary to meet the demands of its large population and industries. It has, however, great purchasing power, derived from interest on investments abroad, from income on the carrying trade, from insurance, and from commissions on exchanges. Naturally its exports and imports do not balance each other. But computations very carefully made by Mr. Giffen some years ago and recently by Mr. Paish show that in England the excess of imports over exports was practically offset by the incomes from the sources which I have named—the amount derived from foreign countries for interest on investments abroad, from the carrying trade, from insurance, and from commissions.

"The United States, on the other hand, is notable for what may be called its self-sufficiency. No country on the globe has so large a supply of that which ministers to the wants of its people as our own country. That is due to the great diversification of soil and of climate, to our great expanse of territory, and to the ready means of communication within our own borders, partly by lakes, rivers, and canals, but more especially by reason of a very highly developed railway system.

"In a newly developed country like Argentina, which is perhaps the best example, there are great resources to be developed. Such a country will inevitably import very large quantities of material for its further development. In the era preceding 1890 immense purchases of material for the construction of a great mileage of railways were made from foreign countries. All of these purchases promoted the future development of the country. On the other hand, Argentina furnishes great quantities of food and raw material for export. But the vital point is that trade exists between countries when one is able to supply the wants of the other and when both have resources sufficient to enable them to buy."

This is what I said then, and I say it again now.

"Means of communication follow the conditions which make for trade and not vice versa. If purchasing power is developed in a nation by an increase of resources, that country will seek to buy from others, lines of ships will then be organized in response to the demand, and means of communication readily obtained.

"Now, who will supply the demand? Naturally it will be that country which can furnish the commodities desired most cheaply and most efficiently. If there is a boat line between two trading countries, and still another country can supply the demand of that purchasing country more cheaply, inevitably shipping lines and lines of communication will be established and commerce transferred from the one which furnishes at the greater cost to the one which furnishes at the lesser cost. This is an inevitable law of trade.

"Another feature which affects the South American trade very materially is the question as to whether the products of two countries engaging in trade are competitive or what is called complementary. Is one a manufacturing country and the other an agricultural country? Does one have an adequate supply of the products required by the other? For an illustration, Argentina for the most part supplies articles similar to those produced in our own country. To some extent, though much less, that is true of Brazil. Europe possesses one great advantage in its trade with Argentina (which is the most rapidly developing country of the South American continent), due to the fact that that country furnishes meat, grain, food, and other similar articles required in Europe. Our own country, at least under present conditions, does not need these products, but is itself producing them in competition with Argentina for export to Europe. So inevitably the trade of Argentina develops more naturally with Europe than with the United States.

"This factor in the situation is, in my judgment, often lost sight of. Overlooking the question of competitive supply and ignoring the demand for our products, we take it for granted that trade will develop between our own country and another. It is not unlike the case of two manufacturing cities within our own borders. If they produce the same articles, the amount of traffic between them will not assume large proportions, but if the goods manufactured in the two cities are different there will be very considerable shipments from the one to the other.

"Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

"The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

"Mr. BURTON. I do.

"Mr. FLETCHER. Speaking with reference to Argentina, Brazil, and the South American countries, I would like to inquire of the Senator if it is possible to develop trade in raw cotton in those countries? We produce some eleven to twelve million bales of cotton and export nearly four-fifths of it. The section to which the Senator is alluding as supplying the products of the soil demanded in Europe I believe does not produce cotton, and there might be a possibility of trade in that article.

"Mr. BURTON. In cotton goods; certainly.

"Mr. FLETCHER. In cotton itself; raw cotton.

"Mr. BURTON. As I understand the Senator from Florida no raw cotton is produced in Argentina.

"Mr. FLETCHER. There is none in South America."

I am not absolutely certain whether that is the case. However, it is not a factor in international trade.

"Mr. BURTON. Nor is there any on the whole of the continent of South America. Then to that extent certainly our country is what may be called complementary in its production, though of course other portions of the world may furnish cotton goods more advantageously and more cheaply than we can. One factor to be considered is the question of the return cargoes. Outgoing boats from South America to Europe or elsewhere carry their food products and naturally return with cotton goods.

"The fallacy that trade follows the flag is readily disproved by statistics and by certain fundamental facts. Trade between countries is influenced by proximity of location, one of the most important factors, by similarity of language, of customs, and of currency, and not by the nationality of a flag or a steamship line.

"As respects the United States the best illustration of that is our trade with Canada. The climate is similar, at least the climate of the northern portion of the United States; their currency is the same, or practically the same, being in dollars rather than in pounds, shillings, and pence; their language is the same; the habits and customs of the people are the same.

"Trade is not a matter of sentiment or of patriotism. It is governed by rules of its own which are of universal application. It is determined by great general principles and by the comparative efficiency of the countries which seek to furnish the articles to each other. It precedes the flag; it does not follow it. There may be a coincidence in cases where the flag of different countries is the same. For instance, in all the colonies of England the English language is spoken, at least by a majority of the merchants and traders. There is also, as a rule, a large infusion from the mother country of immigrants who carry to the colony certain habits and certain preferences for the articles which they have used at home.

"Nationality or race counts potently in determining the country from which a people will derive their supplies. For instance, Brazil purchases a large share of its commodities from Portugal because of the similarity of language and because of the fact that for many years the inhabitants were in close communication with that European Kingdom. Thus not only had the habit been formed of purchasing in Portugal, but the tastes and the customs of the people of Brazil conform in a large degree to those of the country with which they were formerly affiliated."

I may say in this connection it is probable that the communication of Brazil with Portugal diminishes somewhat year by year, and after the lapse of almost exactly four years this statement is less correct that when it was originally made.

"The best illustration of the fact that trade does not follow the flag is to be derived from the trade of Great Britain. Taking the annual average trade for the five-year period from 1855 to 1859, 73.4 per cent of the British export trade was with foreign countries and 26.6 per cent with her own possessions. In the five-year period from 1890 to 1894, inclusive, exactly the same proportion obtained, 73.4 per cent to foreign countries and 26.6 per cent to her colonies, although there had been during this time an enormous increase in the area, population, and wealth of her colonial possessions. But notwithstanding mail steamships"—

I ask especial attention of those who think you are going to build up a traffic with South America by establishing a line of steamers to these facts. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] said yesterday he thought one of the first things the Government would do if it had this authority would be to put on a line of fast ships to South America. There are two very fair lines on this route now which have grown up gradually with the trade, the Lambert & Holt and the Lloyd Brazileiro. Let me read:

"But notwithstanding mail steamships and means of communication which girdle the earth, all flying the English flag, in the five-year period from 1904 to 1908 the proportion of her exports to foreign countries had increased to 77.2 per cent and that to her possessions had fallen from 26.6 per cent to 22.8 per cent."

That is, for the five-year period 1890 to 1894 to the five-year period from 1904 to 1908 there had been a decided decline in the exports from Great Britain to her colonies as compared with the exports to other portions of the earth.

"An even more striking illustration of this same fallacy is the trade of the United States with Canada. In the year 1888, 47.1 per cent of the total imports of Canada came from the United States. In the same year Canada bought but 38.3 per cent of her imports from Great Britain. In 1898 the proportion of imports from the United States into Canada had increased from 47.1 to 60.2 per cent, while those from Great Britain had fallen from 38.3 per cent to 24.8 per cent."

That is, between 1888 and 1898, notwithstanding the steamship lines ran under mail subsidy from Great Britain to Canada, notwithstanding almost every boat that came into Canada flew the British flag, the percentage of imports from Great Britain diminished more than a third while the imports from the United States had increased one-fourth and more, from 47.1 per cent to 60.2 per cent.

Then a different policy was adopted, and let us see how that worked out. Let us see whether the putting on of steamship lines such as you propose to South America or this granting of preferences will build up your trade. Do steamship lines follow trade or does trade follow steamship lines?

"About this time a law was passed in Canada granting preferential rates to imports from Great Britain and, with certain unimportant exceptions, reducing the duties one-third. But notwithstanding this preference of one-third in duty rates in favor of England, the imports from the United States into Canada in the year 1909 were 60.4 per cent of the total, while those from Great Britain fell from 24.8 per cent to 23.7 per cent. It is probable that no object lesson could be cited which more clearly disproves the idea that trade follows the flag than this instance of our relations with the country to the north of us. The following table shows in summary form the progress of our trade with Canada:

Comparison of imports into Canada from the United States and Great Britain.

Years.	Total imports for home consumption.	Imports from United States.	Imports from Great Britain.	Per cent from United States.	Per cent from Great Britain.
1888	$102,847,100	$48,482,000	$39,299,000	47.1	38.3
1898	130,698,006	78,706,000	32,500,000	60.2	24.8
1909	298,205,957	180,027,000	70,683,000	60.4	23.7

"If trade follows the flag, the percentage of imports into Canada from Great Britain would naturally increase instead of decreasing, as the table shows. As already stated, the real factors in the situation are proximity of location, similarity in tastes, language, and currency, ready communication across the border, the ability of our manufacturers to make articles to meet the demands in Canada, and the aggressiveness of our merchants in this market."

Mr. President, I made that argument when I was opposing the views of a very large majority of my colleagues on this side, and I certainly feel very free to make it again now in opposition to a bill introduced on the other side as a result of this most remarkable change of front on the part of our Democratic opponents.

I want to read briefly something in regard to recent trade statistics with Canada. Trade with that country is the distinctive feature of our whole foreign trade. For the last year for which I have statistics, that ending June 30, 1913, the exports of the United States to Canada were greater than our exports to Germany. To that country, with less than 10,000,000 people, we sold more merchandise than to all of Germany. Our exports were exceeded only by those of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. In 1901 our total exports to Canada amounted to $105,000,000. The balance of trade in our favor was $63,000,000.

In 1913—12 years later—our exports had increased from $97,000,000 to $397,000,000. You may search far and wide in the history of trade to find anything comparable with that—a gain of $300,000,000, or a little more than 300 per cent, in 12 years. The excess of exports over imports was $294,000,000; that is, as against the $397,000,000 which we sent to them; it is $415,000,000 when you count in foreign as well as domestic figures. They sent to us $120,000,000, the excess being $294,000,000. I think that under the first full year of the tariff law of 1913, taking the calendar year of 1914, this balance of trade was quite materially diminished, and very naturally so.

That shows where our exports go—to a country of similar tastes, having much the same climate, with the same language and currency, and where deliveries of goods can be made quickly; to a country that is developing along lines very similar to our own, for much of Canada to-day is on the same plane with our own great West in the time when there were millions of acres of fertile soil awaiting settlement and cultivation.

The following table shows the value of merchandise imported into and exported from the United States to Canada:

Mr. President, I want to call attention to several distinctive features of our own trade and to follow that——

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him a moment, he has been amplifying instances of cases where our trade follows along the lines of similar tastes. Is it not also true that just the opposite of that takes place very frequently? Is it not also the fact that trade follows along lines of absolutely diverse tastes and products? I have particularly in mind at the minute the extraordinary development which have taken place between this country and the Philippines in the last four or five years.

Mr. BURTON. I will answer the second question of the Senator in the affirmative. As to diverse products, yes; as to diverse tastes, no. Manifestly the case of the Philippines is altogether exceptional. Under the old colonial system of Spain by which the mother country had every advantage, that country was virtually forced to make its purchases from the parent nation; and an unnatural condition grew up, contrary to the general practices and rules of trade. It was entirely artificial. That Spanish dominion was destroyed, and we stepped in and took possession of the islands. Our trade there has increased very materially. I am well aware that that country will be used as an illustration in support of the argument made by the proponents of this bill that trade does follow the flag; but if we analyze the situation carefully, we will find that such is not the case. An old-time dominion was overthrown and a new one established. In the first place, American supplies were sent there in very considerable quantities for our Army and our Navy. In the next place, American capital went there to engage in the construction of public works and public utilities. Our officials were accustomed to the appliances and devices which were in use in the United States, and they took those with them. In the first instance, a line of Army transports was established between the two countries. Taken all in all, it was more like a subject country, where the supplies were brought for official purposes. After making due allowance for all that, there was, of course, a certain promotion of American trade with the Philippines due to the very striking change in conditions resulting from our acquiring possession of them.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Ohio is aware that the great change that occurred in our trade relations with the Philippines followed after the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill in 1909. Up to that time our total trade with the Philippines was about $14,000,000. It has grown from about $5,000,000, the year after we took over the islands, to $14,000,000 in 1909; but since then it has gone up to the very large figure of something over $51,000,000, which, of course, was due to the establishment of complete reciprocity between this country and those islands.

The reason I ventured to intrude that idea into the argument of the Senator from Ohio was not to in any way interfere with the application which he was making of his statement that trade followed not the steamship lines but the steamship lines followed the trade, but to show that in this very instance it was not due to the fact that there had been any change in our methods of communication, but it was due to the fact that proper legal restrictions and proper methods of trading had been established, which made possible that great increase. The increase also took place because the kind of products which are produced in the Philippines and the kind of products which are produced in this country are entirely the opposites of each other.

Mr. BURTON. I am obliged to the Senator from Rhode Island for calling my attention to one point which for the moment had escaped my memory, namely, the preferential trade arrangement created by the Payne-Aldrich Act of 1909, which no doubt has very greatly increased the volume of trade between the two countries; but I do not believe that even such preferential rates as those can, in the case of a great country, permanently determine the course of trade. Canada is an illustration of that. Her tariff rates are made in favor of Great Britain.

In short, there are other factors which determine the currents of trade which are more potent than the establishment of steamship lines and more influential even than preferential tariffs. Of course, you can make preferential tariffs so severe against one country and so favorable to another that it is practically impossible to trade with any other country than the one enjoying that preference, but it is not probable that in these days any country will resort to devices of that nature.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I do not know exactly what the Senator has in mind as to what did cause the change in the trade between this country and the Philippines, but I think the figures bear out the assumption that it was due almost entirely to what may be called a preferential tariff and which we have been in the habit of calling "reciprocal relations." The development of trade, however, between this country and the Philippines had not taken any great start until the establishment of those relations. From that time until to-day the increase in the trade between the two countries has been very great, and it gives every indication of continuing along the lines that have been stimulated by the result of the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act.

Mr. BURTON. I should seriously doubt whether, as a result of preferential rates, there will be any great preponderance of trade with this country. The Philippines, however, are an exceptional country, quite unlike the great commercial nations of the earth. It is very easy to explain why there should be a marked change in conditions there after our occupancy. The overturning of an old dominion, the establishment of a new government based on more liberal principles, closer association with the United States, the investment of American capital in the islands—all those were contemporaneous with or were followed by the establishment of steamship lines.

Then after 10 or 11 years the preferential tariff arrangement was made, which I concede will occasion a considerable increase in trade, but I do not believe that will be the determining factor. If we continue to enjoy their trade, it will be because we can furnish the articles they want and furnish them under terms that they regard as favorable. We may aid in that trade by tariff arrangements; but, after all, that is not the leading feature of the situation.

Mr. President, the whole subject of our foreign trade becomes involved in this discussion. I think this bill is utterly fallacious, in that it disregards the facts and also the principles which are so clearly in evidence in the establishment of our magnificent export trade. What are the characteristics of the foreign trade of the United States? First and most notable of all is the fact that our exports go to the most advanced nations of the earth—that is, the bulk of them, at any rate.

Much has been said about our trade with South America and about the magnificent possibilities in that continent, which, it is said, surpass the conception and comprehension of even the most optimistic. I believe there is a great field there for us, and I trust the time may come when in a peculiar sense the South American trade will belong to us. But, for reasons that are perfectly apparent, we now rank only third among the nations enjoying commercial relations with the continent to the south of us. Now, why is our trade so largely with the most advanced nations of the earth? In the first place, we possess a great abundance of raw materials and food products which all the older nations need. Some of them have reached a point where they must rely on sources beyond their borders for a sufficient quantity of even the necessities of life. Great Britain is the best illustration of this. Some extravagant figures have been prepared showing the quantity of food supplies which they derive from abroad and of the starvation which would ensue if they were blockaded and deprived of such imports. They have long been in this position.

Germany was supposed to be another illustration, though, according to the best and most recent estimates, they furnish 85 per cent of their food supply. Then there are other countries, like France and Italy, which in some years import and in other years export wheat and other food products. This is a constant demand, for, first of all, the human race must be fed. Formerly the overwhelming proportion of our exports was made up of foodstuffs and of cotton. But this proportion is decreasing year by year.

Next, we have abundant supplies of raw material. Probably copper is the metal which we have in the greatest abundance, and in the mining of which we enjoy the greatest advantage over all the races of the world. Then, whatever others may say to the contrary, our supply of coal is inexhaustible. We may have to go farther afield for the supply; the centers of industry may shift from their present locations to other parts of the United States; but we can hardly conceive that the human race will exist on this planet to the time when the United States will not have a supply of coal. Then we have divers other metals, such as lead and zinc. The whole world demands these, and we have been exporting them. Then I might also mention iron ore, the supply of which is not so great as that of the other metals, and oil, which constitutes a very large item in our exports.

What is the second feature of our exports? The supply of these raw materials is so abundant that we are able to manufacture their products more cheaply than other nations of the world. So, naturally, the first stage in our export trade is marked by the amount of raw material and food products. Next comes the time when, by reason of these abundant raw materials, such as iron ore and coal, we can manufacture iron and steel. So we are coming to be great exporters of those commodities. Still further there are a large number of products where American ingenuity has been able to devise a better and perhaps a cheaper article than is made in any other country on the globe. As illustrations of these you may take our agricultural implements, our machine tools, and divers manufactures of iron and steel. But all these, except perhaps the agricultural implements, go mostly to nations like England, France, Germany, Holland, and Belgium, with smaller quantities to the less advanced countries of the world. There are some very striking illustrations of this situation.

In the year 1913 our exports to Holland, with only 6,000,000 people, were more than to the whole continent of Asia, with its 600,000,000. That simple illustration speaks volumes. Of course, it should be said that Holland does not consume all the exports we send there. It is largely a trading country, shipping the articles on to other nations. But there is that astonishing fact that our exports to Holland, $125,000,000 or thereabouts, were more than to Japan, China, India, Siam, Siberia, and all the portions of the Asiatic continent. This proves my statement that we send more to the advanced countries of the world than we do to those that are less progressive.

I might give one or two further illustrations. In 1908 we exported more to Denmark than to all of Africa. Still further, in 1906 we sent more to the United Kingdom than all the nations of the earth sent to South America. So, if every product except that marked "produced in America" had been shut out of South American ports and we had possessed a monopoly of all their trade, nevertheless in 1906 we would have sent less to all of South America than we did to Great Britain and Ireland. Happily that is not the case now. Our South American trade has very largely increased, and I trust will continue to show further gains.

The exportation of raw materials, food, and certain forms of manufactures does not require that minute study of foreign markets, of the tastes and preferences of people, which is required for the development of new markets. That is one reason why we have not entered these South American countries to a larger degree. It is not because of the absence of ships; it is because we do not know and do not try to find out what they want. Furthermore, this is an enormous growing country, and we use a very large share of our production at home. It is the greatest home market in the world, and, indeed, the greatest market in the world.

Of our manufactured products, which amount to $20,000,000,000 per year, twenty times as great as in 1850, we export only from 2½ to 4 per cent. Of our farming products, exclusive of cotton, we export from 2½ to 6 per cent. The exportation of food products is now diminishing. It reached its maximum proportion about 1880. There were special reasons for the maximum being reached in that year. In the first place, the great West had been touched as by a magic wand. Areas which had been hitherto unsettled were brought under the plow. Towns, cities, railroads ministered to them. We were rapidly reaching not only a maximum of production for our own country, but a position in which we could be the purveyor of the world's wants as regards food. One further reason why our agricultural exports increased was the growth of manufacturing abroad and to bad harvests in foreign countries for several years. In the year 1879 the Archbishop of Canterbury in England directed prayers in the churches because of the bad weather. And in this and succeeding years there was an enormous increase in our food exports to foreign countries. The reason for the decrease since is, in the first place, the growth of manufactures at home. There is a very interesting bit of economic history in relation to Germany in this connection which, in view of its special interest in this time of war, I will briefly state to the Senate.

In the seventies there occurred a discussion, which was a very heated one, in regard to levying tariffs on agricultural products. A very large and influential party favored following the lead of England and relieving food products from all duties. On the other hand, there was the agrarian party, including the farmers and producers, which demanded duties. Between them were the students of the subject, the economists and the publicists, who decided in favor of levying duties on agricultural products and using every possible means to stimulate the home production of food. This policy, then adopted, has brought remarkable results. Lands which seemed a barren waste have been made productive in the highest degree. These were the arguments that they used:

First, that Germany had a sort of insular position, had not then developed a great navy, and in case of war she might be cut off from communication with the outside world, and that so far as possible it was essential that they produce all the necessaries of life at home.

The next argument was to this effect: "We are developing in our manufactures, but how do we know but that other countries to which we would ship our products will themselves become manufacturing nations and erect tariff barriers against our products?" In the same line it was argued: "If these other countries more and more give attention to manufacturing, will not the surplus of food, upon the import of which we now rely, be consumed within their own borders?" They used the United States as an illustration, and very pertinently, for in the year 1913 the value of our imports of food, including the products of the tropical countries, was more than our exports.

I do not share the very pessimistic view of many who think the time is coming when we shall be importers of wheat. It may come in the remote future; but as we are now producing about 14 or 15 bushels to the acre, against, say, 25 to 30 in England, France, and Germany, it is evident that we have not exhausted the benefits of improved methods of farming, and that the time is likely to come when, with better cultivation and increase in the use of fertilizer, our wheat crop will be well-nigh doubled from lands already occupied, and there is a further possibility which arises from lands which have not yet been cultivated.

I now wish to pass to this subject: Has there been any deficiency in the supply of shipping? Freight rates have gone up and down, just like any other costs. There have been years when there was an apparent scarcity of ships; but, generally speaking, there has been an abundance.

There is no branch of business which for a larger number of years during the last decade has been in a depressed condition than the shipbuilding industry in the United Kingdom, Germany, and the United States. If the work of the shipyards had been confined to the mere building of merchant and passenger vessels, they would indeed have experienced a season of depression; but they have been kept alive in this country especially by the demand for warships, colliers, and other naval craft. The whole history of our trade with Great Britain, with Germany, and with France shows that there first existed a foreign need of our products, a need which we could supply, and that with that need yet following it transportation was provided.

Would more wheat have been purchased, or more flour, for Great Britain if there had been a Government line? Would more cotton have been purchased for Manchester, or for the spinners of Lancashire, or for those in the valley of the Seine, or in Saxony, if there had been a Government line?

We are driven to the conclusion that the idea which, according to the report, seems to be fundamental in advocacy of this bill, is an entirely fallacious one. Trade does not follow the flag except in a limited degree. The needs of the human race, their demands, the sources from which they are to be supplied, are first developed, and then the means of communication follow.

I do not say that trade could be conducted without the most careful attention to the question of transportation, and I do not overlook the fact that occasionally railways have been built in anticipation of the future; but let us examine that question a minute. In the first place, it has been much more true of railways than of steamship lines. These railways were laid down through countries which had a certain degree of fertility and productive power, so that they could be sure of development. Those who built them did not build on any uncertainty. They knew that there would be a demand for the products of the lands they traversed, that those lands had certain possibilities in the way of production, and that traffic would eventually be developed. Notwithstanding all that, the fact is that most of the railways leading over the prairies in the great West were so far in advance of the demand they became bankrupt before sufficient freight was developed to maintain them.

I have tried to make this point clear. Mr. President, I regret it seems probable this measure will be determined not by arguments here in the Senate Chamber but by influences from outside. It seems to me the arguments which can be marshaled against this bill, and which will be advanced by others who can state them much better than I, afford conclusive proof that this bill is a dangerous measure; that it will be futile, and ought to be defeated.

A great deal has been said about our trade with South America, and I want to take that up more in detail. I include under the term South America, or with it, Central America and the States north of the Isthmus, and Mexico as well, for in a remarkable degree these countries have similarity of history, customs, tradition, and religion, and in a less degree of race.

I give especial attention to this trade because in the message which the President read to the Congress on the second Tuesday in December he seemed to have in mind only our neighbor States of America. The first bill as drawn for the purchase of ships mentioned South America and Central America, and then paid very scant respect to all the rest of the world by adding the simple word "elsewhere." It was manifest then not only from the message of the President but from the form of the bill as first introduced that its prevailing purpose was to furnish ships for trade with South America.

Mr. President, I have already shown the gradual growth of shipping facilities with South America, and that in the last year, both before and after the beginning of the war, there was a large amount of vacant cargo space in practically every boat that sailed out of New York for those ports. In this opinion the joint letter of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce concurs. They mention the difficulty in obtaining cargoes. As I said yesterday, a boat that should have sailed the 5th of December in the ordinary course of things did not sail until the 29th.

It is true there are no such passenger lines between New York and Rio and Buenos Ayres as there are between New York and Liverpool and Southampton and cities on the continent of Europe, but that is because the traffic does not warrant it. If you were to put the Imperator or the Vaderland on a line between New York and South American ports, you would be confronted, in the first place, with the fact that there are no ports in which they could dock; in the next place, there is no traffic which would justify the placing of so large and expensive a boat on that line.

Now, there is the situation. The original object of this bill and the original arguments in support of it, when confronted with the cold facts in the case, fall to the ground. There is no scarcity of shipping over this route. There is no considerable increase in rates.

Oh, but it was said yesterday we will put on an extra line there. The Lamport & Holt Line sent out a boat every week for a while—boats of 12,000 tons; some as good boats as those of the American Line, and as large, which were given American registration in 1890 or 1892. Those boats now are running only at intervals; the need is not there. One of the Lamport & Holt boats came in a few days ago with only 26 passengers when there were good accommodations for perhaps 300, or at least a very large number.

What are you going to do? Are you going to put on a passenger line at the Government expense under such circumstances as that, with good-sized boats scheduled to sail every week, when after an interval of a month without any sailing the first boat comes in with only about a quarter of a hundred passengers? Is it seriously proposed to ask the taxpayers of America to back so absurd a proposal?

On the average boats are sailing out of New York for Rio and for Buenos Aires and Montevideo every three days. The figures which I gave here yesterday show that down to the end of September they sailed at the rate of 10 each month, I believe; that is, in 9 months there were 96 steamers. I have here the figures, which I will ask to have printed, showing that in the last three months of the year—October, November, and December—23 steamers sailed from New York for Rio, or substantially eight each month, showing very conclusively that it is not lack of boats but lack of freight which confronts us. The one sailing on December 24 had 18,000 cubic feet of empty space, or room for substantially 4,500 tons which she did not carry.

On the west coast the conditions are the same. Possibly at a later time I shall read from a report of a commission with which the Secretary of Commerce was closely associated in which they confirm all these statements that there is no scarcity of ships in that direction.

When the original structure falls down, lo and behold the efforts made to build up another. The bill, which only spoke of all the rest of the world outside of this continent as "elsewhere," is changed so that it is general in its nature and provides for American foreign trade generally.

But before we leave this subject, in view of the arguments in regard to building up South American trade, let us dwell upon that for a time. The American people have not yet taken the pains to study the problem of South America. They have not yet come to appreciate the South American people. It is one of the subjects which should receive our most earnest care in future years.

I would not enthrone increase of trade as the be-all in our relations with these countries. The whole world is seeking new outlets for its products. With these people who are near to us, who naturally have a tie which is not only geographical but political, we should have other relations which should awaken our earnest thought aside from those which pertain to markets.

In the first place, they should be assured—and I trust they are assured by the policy of administration of both parties—that we desire no part of their territory. We gave a splendid object lesson in that regard 16 years ago, when the Senate adopted a provision, as an amendment to a pending bill, to the effect that we expected no part of the territory of Cuba, an amendment which was no mere empty form of words, but which was carried into effect. We went there with our Army and our Navy, and after the sweat and toil and the clash of arms we freed Cuba from Spanish dominion; we sought no territory, but sought only to establish them as a free, self-governing people, to be numbered among the nations of the earth. We have not intervened since then, except for the restoration of order, and that merely for a temporary period. Central and South America should know, and all the world should know, that we are not seeking to enlarge our borders by the annexation of any part of their territory.

But, Mr. President, I think it is desirable for us to go a step further than that and to abstain from interference in their local affairs, except so far as it may be necessary for the protection of our citizens or for the protection of foreigners whom we are under obligations to protect. If we demand that foreign Governments keep their armies and navies away from American shores, impliedly, at least, we assume the duty of safeguarding their citizens and protecting their rights and property ourselves.

I may also say it makes a most painful impression throughout all those southern Republics when the administration at Washington takes the side of one faction or another in their internal affairs. One of two courses we must pursue—either say we will dominate your affairs, we will say who shall be your President, or keep away. Mr. President, I favor the latter policy.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMMONS in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What the Senator is now saying upon our course with reference to these South American and Central American countries certainly has my sympathy and support. It has been claimed, and I have seen no denial of it, that the Government of the United States for a long time has been maintaining at the capital city of one of the Central American countries a force of United States marines, and that the effect of the maintenance of this body of marines has been to keep in power a certain government, a certain set of officials in that country. If that condition exists, I ask the Senator from Ohio whether it is not likely that it will bring about a feeling of very great resentment on the part of the people of that country. It seems to me that that would be the natural tendency of it; and as that resentment is brought about, and as it must naturally increase if we proceed with that sort of thing, I ask the Senator whether it is not very likely to interfere with our trade with that country and incidentally with the trade of other countries that will sympathize with this Central American country in that situation?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator is undoubtedly correct. Mr. President, the landing of those marines and their retention was, of course, not opposed by the faction which was aided; but the rest of the people, and that very large class in the country who deplore foreign interference, certainly look with profound disfavor upon anything of this kind. I do not want to say——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. In just a minute. Let me finish, please. I do not mean to say that circumstances might not arise in which it would be justifiable for the preservation of order, and especially for the protection of foreign interests, to land our marines. I remember a very interesting discussion between the late Senator from Georgia, Senator Bacon, and the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] on this subject, the Senator from Georgia taking the ground that it was not permissible to land our troops, even in an emergency or for a day, as I recall it, without the direction of Congress. The Senator from New York took the opposite stand, and I think that has been the policy of our Government, that in the time of some serious revolution, where there was likely to be bloodshed and public order destroyed and foreign residents as well as natives liable to suffer, it was justifiable to land marines. But to continue there permanently and virtually maintain a military government by armed intervention is not consistent with our policy, and, besides, is sure to lead to friction and a disruption of our normal relations with the South and Central American countries. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks it is any defense in landing troops, as he has pointed out, that the nation which the troops are sent there to aid give their consent to it? That would always be true, would it not?

Mr. BURTON. It should be for the purpose of maintaining order under circumstances in which the interests of our own citizens or foreigners to whom we owe a certain obligation are involved.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator, in answer to the Senator from Utah, rather impliedly, at least, to justify the landing of marines on the ground that the faction we were assisting made no objection to their landing.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so. I said that the faction that was helped would not object. Of course, they would not, because the troops were their stay and support.

Mr. NORRIS. Can the Senator tell us how long we have had marines now in Nicaragua?

Mr. BURTON. I think about three years.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand so. The force is still retained there.

Mr. BURTON. I so understand it.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator have any idea that the Government they are assisting would last any length of time if they were withdrawn?

Mr. BURTON. I could not say in regard to that. It stands to reason, however, that the fact of their retention indicates that it would not.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not the fact then, in that case at least, that by the landing of our marines and retaining them there we are keeping in power a certain faction in a foreign country?

Mr. BURTON. It so seems to me.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not only that, if the Senator will permit me, and in what I am going to say I am not in any manner passing upon the wisdom of the treaty which was involved nor attempting to discuss it; but while we are maintaining in this capital of a Central American country a force of marines, the effect of the presence of which is said to be to keep in power a certain Government, we are undertaking to make a treaty with that very Government which we are maintaining. Irrespective of the question as to whether the treaty is a wise treaty or not, it does not appear to me that it is a seemly situation for this great Government, with its tremendous power, with its unlimited power in comparison with these small, weak Central American countries, to be maintaining a Government, or to be maintaining a force of marines, which in turn maintains a Government down there, and then treating with that Government as though it was wholly independent of us. It savors altogether too much of an attempt to make a contract with ourselves.

Mr. BURTON. I fully agree with what the Senator from Utah says. It is similar to making a treaty with a man in prison on the condition that if the treaty is made he will be let out. I do not wish, in saying this, to express any opinion as to the so-called Nicaraguan treaty. I have no doubt it has some very favorable features.

Before the interruption I was stating, Mr. President, that we must pursue one of two courses—either take control, put up or put down Presidents and administrations at will, or, subject always to our duty to our own citizens and to other nations, leave them to themselves.

As I understand it, it is the impression of this administration that the question in Mexico is an agrarian one, or, in broad, general terms, an economic one, namely, that there is an unfortunate division of land; that great proprietors have large tracts, and that the title to those immense holdings has been acquired by methods which would not be approved if thoroughly analyzed. Mr. President, however much we may sympathize with this situation, it is not for us or our administration to say we will put up one side or the other according to the political or economic views they may hold, for the moment any administration take that position they deny that their neighbor nation is a free people. There will never be lacking times when it will be said party A is in the wrong and party B is in the right; that party A is an organization which makes for uplift and party B for retrogression, because that means constant interference; it means domination over them.

Mr. President, if we look over the political map of the world what is the fact? Whatever nation has attained to excellence in free government has gained it after a long course of self-sacrifice. The path of freedom and permanence has been beset by faction, by dispute, by bloodshed, and woe before the final goal of real popular government has been attained. It is not for us to say to Mexico or to Venezuela or to Nicaragua or any other country, "You know not how to govern yourselves; we know better," for that assumption immediately destroys their freedom if it is carried into effect. It stands in the way of their attaining to permanent popular institutions, and is a denial of the very fundamental ideas which we have cherished from the days of Lexington and Concord through all our conflicts down to the present day. Indeed, it goes far back of Lexington and Concord. The sturdy inhabitant of the Colony, with his gun or his sword, was always ready to protect himself and his fellow citizens and to speak for liberty of conscience and of action.

Why should we take sides with one or another? Here is a danger which has come into glaring prominence, as it seems to me, within the last few months. If we take up the cause of one or another, we may choose very unwisely. In aiding in the putting down of one we may lift into power another about whom the question will immediately arise, "Is he really any better than the first?" That is the danger we always run.

I have stated these facts because they are of great importance in all our relations with the countries to the south of us. They are more important than the establishment of steamship lines by the Government of the United States. We should do away with this everlasting superciliousness toward our neighbors to the south and the idea that we of the Anglo-Saxon civilization are better or holier than they.

The circumstances of the settlement of South America were very different from those which pertained to the settlement of the United States. They are clearly pointed out, and I think in as excellent form as anywhere, by Mr. Roosevelt in the first chapter of his book entitled "The Winning of the West." He showed that while the United States of America were being developed the English and other settlers from abroad drove out, practically exterminated, the inhabitants of the soil whom they found. The Spaniards of South America and Central America, the Pizarros, the Balboas, and others who dominated the people, made them their servants, killed some of them, allowed others to live, but did not exclude them from the land which they occupied. As a result, there grew up in South and Central America a composite civilization, in which the Spaniard, the resident of the Iberian Peninsula, lived alongside the original Indian; and upon this foundation the structure of their institutions has been built.

On this subject I want to refer to a very excellent pamphlet by the Peruvian minister, being an address delivered at Worcester, Mass., on November 21, 1913, entitled "Contrast in the Development of Nationality in Anglo-America and Latin America." I wish to refer to this at some length, because while persons are groping round about increasing trade with South America, and some are proposing to put on Government lines of boats, it is well for us to get at the root of the real difficulty; it is well for us to build up good feeling there, a desideratum which, in the long run, may be far more gratifying to the American people and to the people of South America than the selling of a certain amount of American implements and of other articles, and in the end lead more effectively to trade relations. In this address the author says:

I have chosen as my subject a question that is most important at this time, when there is a growing tendency to know better and to understand the peoples of the Latin-American nations; to get closer to them by establishing bonds of friendship through commercial relations based on mutual respect and confidence, as is evidenced by this conference and by the recent utterances of the President of the United States in his memorable declarations at Mobile.

In order to properly determine the relative positions and conditions of the two great groups of individuals that people this American world north and south of the Rio Grande and the Gulf of Mexico we must first study the contrasts in the development of nationality in these two groups that, for expediency, I shall denominate or class as "Anglo-American" and "Latin-American."

No man can truly appreciate another if he does not know him. No nation can feel friendship toward another if it does not know it. But to know should imply understanding, without which there can be nothing in common, and understanding is essential to draw individuals together, and this is also true of nations.

International relations are necessary. They are cultivated for many reasons, but they do not necessarily mean friendship. Nations, like individuals, live on good terms with their neighbors because it behooves them to do so, but this does not imply that they are friends, that there is any closer relation between them other than one of courteous deference toward each other.

Such neighbors, whether they be individuals or nations, do not know each other, much less do they understand each other. There is, consequently, no true friendship between them; no bond of union.

Therefore, if such people wish to become friendly, they must begin by knowing each other, becoming acquainted through intercourse and thus discover their respective traits and characteristics, so that, in course of time, a sentiment of understanding is born, which, being reciprocal, eventually gives way to friendship, and, in like manner, to amity between nations.

Therefore, as a first essential to the study of the subject matter of these remarks, we must place ourselves in a position to perfectly understand the very peculiar conditions of settlement and growth of Latin America before we can obtain any fair estimate of present-day Latin America.

These conditions were very different to those that have been found in Anglo-America. This is a most important point, and one that should be made clear to all who in this Nation and elsewhere are trying to know and to understand Latin America and its people.

When this point becomes apparent to all, then I shall expect to see another attitude toward our people. I contend that the average Anglo-American does not appreciate us because he invariably wants to measure us by his own standards, regardless of the fact that those standards do not happen to fit our special type of humanity.

Physically we are more or less similar, but in a moral sense each has special traits of character that mark the peculiar idiosyncrasies in each. Therefore if we reverse the process and we Latin Americans measure you Anglo-Americans by our standards, we, likewise, would find you as below par according to our estimate, which proves my premises that, firstly, secondly, and lastly, we have to thoroughly understand each other if there is to be any reciprocal appreciation; and it behooves us to be forbearing, generous, and accepting the other's idiosyncrasies as absolutely exact traits of character born with the individual or developed in him through environment. In order to make this point clear I must ask you to consider two things: First, the relative conditions at the time of the discovery by Christopher Columbus of the territories that constitute what is known to-day as the United States of North America and of those that constitute Latin America; second, the class and type of white men who became the first settlers in either section of the American Continent, on your territory and on ours.

Your territory, at the time of the advent of the white man from Europe, was more or less of a virgin territory, inhabited by savage and semisavage nomadic tribes, thinly scattered all over a very vast area. While our territory was to a very great extent organized into States, in a measure barbaric, but, nevertheless, semicivilized, densely populated, and concentrated in a manner to make for cohesion. Mayas, Aztecs and Toltecs, Caras, Chimus, Incas, Aymaras, and Quichuas, and other tribes less known overran our territory and presented marked contrast with conditions in yours.

As the news of the discovery of the New World invaded the European countries, two types that were to mold the destinies of the wonderlands beyond the seas were brought into play—the one formed of the oppressed and persecuted by religious intolerance, the other of the adventurous soldiers of fortune in quest of gold and adventures.

Both of these started out with set purposes; the oppressed and persecuted came to the New World, to build up new homes, free from all the troubles left behind; while the adventurous came bent on destroying and carrying away everything they could lay their hands on. So here we have the true genesis of the formation of nationality in Anglo and Latin America. In the two great classes, the permanent and the temporary, the one to build up, the other to tear down and destroy. The one came with reverence, the other with defiance; both with an equally set purpose, but the one with humility in his heart, the other proud and overbearing; the one full of tenderness born of his religious zeal, the other cruel and unscrupulous.

Thus we find that Anglo-America was settled by austere men, seeking religious freedom, men who were fleeing from States with laws prejudicial to their beliefs and practices, men dissatisfied with the political conditions in their own countries, who did not wish to go so far as to sever their connection entirely with the fatherland, but who sought in the new colonies ameliorated conditions under their own flag; men who came to build homes in a new land, eager to remain because, full of energy, they saw in the very newness of the land the great opportunities it offered them to build a greater commercial and political future for themselves. Besides these good elements there came, as a matter of course, a few adventurous outlaws, and others attracted to the New Land by the prevalent "wanderlust" of the times—the latter, a decided minority.

Let us now turn to Latin America. To her went the soldiers of fortune, valiant but ignorant, adventurous and daring yet unscrupulous. They came principally from a country where religious bigotry was rampant. They were an admixture of virtues and vices. They came to conquer, to fight if necessary; their one aim was to better their lot, regardless of by what means or as to the consequences. The companions of Pizarro, Hernando Cortez, De Soto, Almagro, Pedrarias, Vasco Nuñez de Balboa, were in marked contrast to the men who came to the shores of New England with the Pilgrim Fathers.

To us came the militarists seeking a field for new exploits, and in their wake came adventurous outlaws seeking gold and riches. Of course, there also came some good men, some who would have been willing to preserve what they found, but these were a minority, and, besides, the existing conditions throughout our territories prevented this. Because while in your territory there were nothing but nomadic, savage and semisavage tribes, without fixed settlements, in our territory the Spaniards came upon organized States, having a certain civilization of their own.

So we have it that in Anglo-America the whites arrived and settled peacefully, acquiring the ownership of the land from the native Indians, either by right of purchase, by peaceful treaty negotiations, or in some instances by forceful occupation, after actual warfare with the aborigines, which ended with the conquest of the land, but not of its inhabitants, who in each case were driven westward.

In Latin America the whites came as a militarily organized force. They overran the countries they discovered, fighting their way from the very outset right into the heart of the unknown territories that they seized, destroying everything, plundering wholesale, and making a display of force and rare indomitable courage so as to cower the astonished natives. In Latin America the white men overthrew the native governments and established themselves as the governing class, reducing the Indian to a state bordering on actual slavery that, in many instances, was slavery. Every cruelty was resorted to by the conquerors. No pity nor mercy was ever shown unto the defenseless tribes. From the very first it was a question of asserting his superiority as a master and making the Indian feel that he was but a mere tool in his master's hands.

Our men did not bring their women and families until many years after the conquest. In consequence, the Spaniards from the very commencement took to themselves Indian women, and their offspring became the "Mestizos," a mixed race that the haughty and pure Castilians in Spain never countenanced, although they were of their own flesh and blood. Later on, when conditions became more settled, the Spaniards brought their families, and after a time the "Creoles" came into existence.

* * * * * * *

In like manner, and as we had started out with the wrong foot at the time of the Conquest, the same misfortune befell us when we launched out into independent statehood. In other words, we ran before we walked. We wrote before we learned our A B C. We assumed a developed stage without first having had the preliminaries. How different this was in your case! Yet how very few people are there who think of this when discussing and criticizing us? How many are there among you who think of this and stop to consider to what extent the Latin-American countries and their people have been handicapped?

We have been misjudged. We have been misrepresented at all times. And all because our critics have failed to look into our early histories and ascertain the why and wherefore of the present state of affairs. They have sought in our countries for practically the same conditions as exist in other more fortunate lands, where the evolution of nationality has been gradual and logical, because there has been a foundation for it.

It is impossible to build where the foundation is not solid, where the ground has not first been well broken and prepared. As I stand here before you and think that I come from the country that is proud to possess the oldest trace of prehistoric civilization on the continent, the nation that boasts the most ancient seat of learning in the Americas, it grieves me to consider that, notwithstanding the age of my country and the venerableness of that seat of learning, the University of San Marcos, we still are, as a nation, in our infancy. And it is so because only now are we developing our true nationality. And we know now that the formative period may be considered as well over, and we feel ready to face the future with full confidence in ourselves and in our country.

Some of the countries of Latin America have already made wonderful strides along the path of progress, material and intellectual. Some have already crossed their Rubicon and are forging ahead at a rapid pace. Argentina, in which conditions are more analogous to those of the United States, has already attained a greater material growth than any other Latin-American nation. The tide of immigration from the European countries has been for some years steadily flowing toward the southern part of our continent. Brazil and, more specially, Argentina have been receiving in increased numbers European settlers. In Argentina the blending of the races is taking place and a condition similar to that which occurred in the United States is developing there. Southern Brazil and Uruguay, on the Atlantic, and Chile, on the Pacific, are developing strong nationalities. In the latter country climatic conditions and a more homogeneous race have been favorable.

The Panama Canal will open the west coast of Latin America to European immigration. It will help to open to trade the countries on the Pacific slope. Through the new waterway Peru will be in a direct line of communication with Europe and the Gulf and Atlantic ports of the United States. The canal will be the great gateway through which will flow to our shores a stream of progress, carrying along with it men with capital, men with energy and activity, men who will come to us in the spirit that the pioneers from these New England States went into the West of this great country and founded there a greater empire of wealth than even the Pilgrim Fathers founded in this section of your country.

There is a happy faculty that is common to the whole of America, of being able to readily assimilate diverse foreign immigrants and turn them into good citizens. The melting pot does not exist only in your country. In each of the Latin-American nations it is doing the work of fusing into one great nationality the stray elements from all over Europe.

* * * * * * *

I would beg you to consider this question when you are judging the Latin American. Bear in mind what I have tried to make clear to you, and if you do this, you will be better able to understand his idiosyncrasy and in time you will perhaps look upon him as a companion and a fellow worker in the great cause of human uplift. We are all striving for a common goal. Our methods may differ, but our aspirations are the same, and the earnest endeavor of each is worthy of the respect of the other.

Mr. President, this pamphlet by a South American diplomat states so fully the grounds of misunderstanding and, in a measure, the repulsion between the people of Latin America and those of the United States that I have taken the liberty of quoting liberally from it.

There is a question more important than the shipping bill, and yet closely associated with it, namely, a realization of the proper attitude of our people toward all foreign Governments. I regret to say that there is nothing that appeals so strongly to a certain class of our population as an attack upon foreigners. Unfortunately there have been times in the history of the United States when the fortunes of a political party have been at a low ebb and when the emission of some paper attacking a foreign nation has seemed to restore the equilibrium and brought popularity to the administration which has emitted the fulmination against some other people. To attack the Government of the people of some foreign land is regarded as an appeal to patriotism. It is an easy way to gain popularity; it loses no votes, and it seems to appeal to the unthinking.

Mr. President, we are one of the family of nations. Great and growing as we are, we are nevertheless but a small part of the multitudes who people this globe of ours, and, just as one individual owes courtesy and politeness and a proper observance of the amenities of life toward another, so we, the people of the United States, owe due respect toward all the peoples of the earth.

The great progress of science has aided us in this regard. It has broken down the barriers of space and time, by the railway, by the steamship, by the electric cable, so that the pulsations of the Old World are felt almost instantaneously in the New World. Let us seek a better understanding with other nations. Then peace, good will, and trade will follow.

I make a special appeal for this good will for the people of Latin America. Their history is different from ours. There is too wide a difference of race and tradition. Their civilization comes for the most part from the Latin race. Whatever we may think of that race, we ought to realize that 2,000 years ago it dominated the world, wonderful in its organization, powerful in its government, conquering the earth, establishing law much of which is in force to-day, and exerting an influence destined to be potent to the remotest day, while our ancestors were living in the forest and dwelling in huts. We may feel that we are superior to the Latin race and to all its descendants, but we owe them respect; as this writer has phrased it, we should regard even their idiosyncrasies with a charitable disposition.

What has been the growth of things in South America? We may commence with the Spanish invader, who came for conquest and for gold, caring not for the people, giving an impression which must last for centuries that government is synonymous with oppression and that rulers by nature are oppressors. About the year 1806, 108 years ago, after a long era of colonial dominion, the peoples of these States began to rebel, and in time they gained their independence. They looked to Washington as the great liberator of this country, and while the forms of government there are largely founded on our own, nevertheless the careful reader will discover that the spirit which dominated the revolutions of 1806 and succeeding years was more derived from the French revolution than from our own. The similarity of races and the partial similarity of language, the use of the Spanish language predominantly and the universal knowledge of their scholars of the French language, have given them a bent toward Latin and especially toward French civilization. So their ideas are different from our own. We do not have to cross the ocean to find people who are Spanish or Portuguese or French in their traditions; we find them on our own continent, and we should give due consideration to their habits of thought and traditions which are quite different from our own. We should especially maintain the attitude that the larger and more powerful members of the family of nations in the new world must treat all alike with justice, so that we shall have regard for the small, undeveloped nation as well as the strong, so that we may in every way promote good feeling and amity among them, aid them, and not in any way seek to interfere with them for our own benefit.

Little by little there has been a growth in the spirit of nationality and in the maintenance of orderly government. The progress along that line in the majority of the nations to the south of us has been very marked in the last decade; in fact, in all recent decades. Let us hold out to them the helping hand, and not seek to lay upon them the mailed fist of power. That is the problem—good understanding, removal of asperities and grounds of animosity, fellow feeling, the spirit under which we shall let them know we intend to dwell in peace and harmony with them and not use the strong arm of force. That is what is most needed, Mr. President; and I am unwilling to leave the Senate until I shall express my earnest desire for a better understanding with the States of South America. They are making such progress as any nation could be expected to make in their position.

Do you realize, Mr. President, how much popular government depends upon scientific progress? Without good roads and means of communication by the railway and the telegraph, without the printing press which publishes the news, and the telegraph which rapidly transmits it, that solidarity of public opinion, that amount of understanding of the proper functions of government which is necessary can not exist. You must have the improvements which have come with this modern day; otherwise, people dwell remote from each other, do not understand each other, and sources of irritation are constantly arising. This problem is somewhat complicated in South America by the difficulty of crossing great mountains, though among the world's great engineering feats are numbered the building of the tunnel through the Andes, the construction of railways in Peru to the old capitals of Arequipa and Cuzco, and the bringing of La Paz, in Bolivia, into communication with the outside world.

How is trade to be promoted with South America, if I may go down on that plane, which to my mind is several levels lower than the question of good relations with those countries? Why has not our trade been larger in South America? Why have we been surpassed by Germany and England in the quantity of exports to those countries? If that question had been asked 20 or 25 years ago the answer would have been that the trade did not exist there in any such volume as it did in other nations of the earth. It is now increasing very rapidly, however. It is assuming large proportions. Of course as a condition of their buying things, of their having a chance to import, they must produce something, or they must give promise of producing something; for they must either have the commodities to exchange for the products of other countries or they must have something on which to negotiate loans where the prospect will be reasonably assured that they can pay in the future.

I have already pointed out that very largely their products are the same as our own—wheat, flour, meats. There is beginning to be a scarcity of hides in this country, and we are importing a good many from Argentina and perhaps other countries; but their products are very largely competitive, and that fact has given a bent of trade toward the countries of Europe, where their products are more readily utilized.

Then there is another factor that is probably more powerful than that. We have been so well satisfied with avenues for the disposition of our products already obtained that we have given attention chiefly to supplying the markets at home and of the advanced countries of Europe. We have not realized that South America has ideas, methods, preferences of her own. If we make a certain staple article, we think South America should use that article. We make it and ship it down there. When it arrives we find that it is not suited to their tastes and uses. We have not sent our salesmen there to learn their language, to learn their methods of trade. We have not squared our methods with theirs. They are a sensitive, formal, polite people. They do not do business in the same way that we do. Further than all that, and very important, we are not ready, or have not been ready thus far, to make loans to them. I said yesterday that more correct than "Trade follows the flag" was the saying that "Trade follows a loan." Like our great West in its early development, like Canada in its present development, so South America is a new country, and trade has increased beyond the amount of available capital. They must, consequently, borrow from abroad. Our competitors—Great Britain, Germany, and in a measure other countries—have made them loans on condition that their rails for railroad building, their locomotives, their material for great structures of iron and steel should be purchased from the parties making the loan, or perhaps, more broadly, they agree to sell on credit. We have not yet entered that field. They demand long time—six months, perhaps, where the prevailing custom in the United States is 30 days. They demand that packages be put up in a particular manner, not required in our domestic trade; and this is not a mere whimsical demand. It is made necessary perhaps because of the severe handling to which articles are subjected in being sent to South America or for other excellent reasons.

There are other conditions besides those I have named, but these are the fundamental ones. They go down deep in their roots to the differences between the people of the United States and those of South America. They are increased and intensified by conditions that have grown up there in recent years.

With the indulgence of the Senate, I shall read from a document recently issued which, I think, contains the best statement on this subject of any article on South American trade. It was prepared by a Latin-American trade committee appointed by the Secretary of Commerce, Hon. W. C. Redfield, under a resolution adopted at the informal Latin-American Trade Conference called at Washington, September 10, 1914, by the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Commerce:

The informal conference assembled at Washington on September 10, 1914, by the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Commerce brought together a number of diplomatic and consular representatives of Republics of South and Central America and representatives of American business and of commercial and industrial organizations, including the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, the Southern Commercial Congress, and the National Foreign Trade Council. After a general discussion, which brought forth prominently the commercial needs of both the United States and the sister Republics, a resolution was adopted requesting the Secretary of Commerce to appoint a general committee on Latin-American trade to consist of the members of the Latin-American committee, already appointed by the National Foreign Trade Council, and representative men from various parts of the United States.

To show the authority to which this document is entitled, I will read the names of the appointees:

Secretary Redfield accordingly appointed as members of the committee: John Barrett, Director General of the Pan American Union, Washington, D. C.; William Bayne, president of the New York Coffee Exchange, New York, N. Y.; W. B. Campbell, president Perkins-Campbell Co., Cincinnati, Ohio; Robert Dollar, president Robert Dollar Co., San Francisco, Cal.; James A. Farrell, of New York, chairman National Foreign Trade Council; William A. Gaston, president National Shawmut Bank, Boston, Mass.—

I presume the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], if he were here, would know him very well—

J. P. Grace, president W. R. Grace & Co., New York, N. Y.; Fairfax Harrison, president Southern Railway Co., Washington, D. C.; Alba B. Johnson, president Baldwin Locomotive Works, Philadelphia, Pa.; C. J. Owens, managing director Southern Commercial Congress, Washington, D. C.; Lewis W. Parker, president Parker Cotton Mills, Greenville, S. C.; William E. Peck, president William E. Peck & Co., New York, N. Y.; William Schall, Müller, Schall & Co., New York, N. Y.; W. D. Simmons, president Simmons Hardware Co., St. Louis, Mo.; Willard Straight, with J. P. Morgan & Co., New York, N. Y.; E. P. Thomas, president United States Steel Products Co., New York, N. Y.; J. H. Waddell, Hard & Rand, New York, N. Y.; Daniel Warren, American Trading Co., New York, N. Y.; Harry A. Wheeler, vice president Union Trust Co., Chicago, Ill.

I read from the report and recommendations of the committee:

Industrial, commercial, and financial conditions throughout the world have been disorganized by the European war. The trade of the United States with Latin America has been seriously affected. The present period of confusion will, however, be succeeded by one of readjustment and reorganization. Your committee was appointed to investigate this situation and to suggest measures to relieve the emergency and to place the trade of the United States with the sister Republics on a permanently satisfactory and mutually profitable basis.

The products of Argentina, Brazil, Chile, and Peru exported to the United States differ each from the other and are dissimilar in turn from those which we in this country import from Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador, Paraguay, Uruguay, and Venezuela, from the Central American States and Panama, from Mexico and from Cuba, the Dominican Republic, and Haiti. These products for the purposes of this analysis may be considered together as raw materials, just as the goods which we export to these countries may be classified as manufactures. Mutual advantage for both the United States of America and the other Republics lies in a wider interchange.

In a properly comprehensive report the trade of the United States with each of the Latin-American Republics should be separately considered. We realize that in each case the problem is different and demands an individual solution. In general, however, this trade rests solely on exchange of commodities; that it has, in its essentials, been barter, with a settlement of balances through London, and has not been built up by extensive investment of foreign capital as has been the case with British and German trade.

The accompanying report deals with certain underlying principles applicable to our Latin-American trade as a whole. We feel that recognition of basic facts affords the only proper basis for meeting problems which while they differ in the several countries are nevertheless fundamentally the same.

Your committee feels that articles recently appearing in the press regarding commercial opportunities in Central and South America have unduly emphasized the promising aspects thereof, and have, in most instances, failed to state that our exporters already doing business with these regions find that their sales have been decreased rather than increased owing to the war.

Mr. President, I have a fear that some of the articles recently appearing in the press have influenced the judgment of some persons who are favoring this bill. They gave the impression that there were empty markets in South America, when this conference, including men who understood the subject best, states what the newspapers have failed to state, that "our exporters already doing business with these regions find that their sales have been increased rather than decreased owing to the war." There is not much "empty market" about that. "Decreasing sales"—not much need of additional transport facilities, either. The report dwells upon the "undue emphasis laid on the promising aspects of trade with these localities":

Your committee recognizes the present time as one when competition is less effective than in the past and than it will be in the future, until European bankers, merchants, and manufacturers recover from the effects of the war.

Your committee, moreover, believes that an opportunity is now afforded to place the trade of the United States with other American nations upon a firm foundation, supporting a more comprehensive structure, which may be built as the situation again more nearly approaches normal.

Your committee feels, however, that there is great danger that our merchants and manufacturers unfamiliar with Latin-American conditions may be induced by recent publicity to undertake ventures in that field which not only will be unremunerative but actually disastrous, and in their ultimate result make for a reaction of the very healthy and much to be desired interest in foreign trade now manifest throughout the United States, an interest which, if properly directed, should be of great permanent value.

If merchants and manufacturers are liable to make that mistake, and be induced by recent publicity to undertake ventures which not only will be unremunerative but actually disastrous, what must be expected of those who are misguided, blind, or ignorant?

SOUTH AMERICAN TRADE CONDITIONS.

The trade of the principal South American countries with England, Germany and the United States is shown by the following table:

Imports and exports of the South American countries from and to England, Germany, and the United States for the years specified.

[2] Figures taken from U. S. Daily Consular and Trade Reports.
[3] Figures are for 1911 and are taken from Pan American Union publication.

The above figures show that exports from Great Britain and Germany to South America considerably exceed imports from that region.

This balance in favor of Europe may, in a measure, be explained by the fact that proceeds of loans issued by the South American Governments in Europe are remitted not in cash but in goods.

AMERICAN EXPORTS CONCENTRATED.

Our export trade to South American countries particularly, and to a lesser degree the Central American States, is concentrated. It is estimated that 75 per cent of our principal exports to South America are the products of large organizations. Our principal exports to the River Plate may be roughly stated to consist of agricultural machinery and allied products, steel products, oil products—kerosene, gasoline, etc.—and printing paper of various kinds. Our exports to Brazil, Chile, and Peru are largely limited to steel and oil products, locomotives, and electrical machinery. Our trade in cotton cloths, shoes, stockings, wearing apparel, and miscellaneous goods has not made up an important part of the total because of our unwillingness or inability to meet British and German competition.

Even before the war our export trade to all Latin America, and notably South America, had begun to decrease on account of the prevailing financial stringency. Our imports, however, increased in value, and the trade balance adverse to the United States for the fiscal year 1913–14 greatly exceeded that of 1912–13 both for all Latin America and for South America alone.

The accompanying table shows the distribution of this trade:

	Exports.		Imports.
	1913	1914	1913	1914
Central America, West Indian republics, and Mexico	$177,627,892	$157,530,244	$224,685,344	$246,405,592
South America	146,147,993	124,539,909	217,734,629	222,677,075
Total	323,775,885	282,070,153	442,419,973	469,082,667

Trade balance adverse to the United States.

	1913	1914
In trade with Central America, West Indian republics, and Mexico	$47,057,452	$88,875,348
In trade with South America	71,586,636	98,137,166
In trade with all Latin America	118,644,088	187,012,514

EFFECT OF THE WAR ON SOUTH AMERICAN COUNTRIES.

Since August 1 of this year the countries in South America whose currency is not already on a gold basis have experienced a serious depreciation of their paper money.

The export of copper, tin, nitrates, coffee, and other products has been curtailed because of loss of the normal European markets. As indicative of financial conditions, bank holidays and moratoria were declared at the outbreak of hostilities, which were extended in certain countries from 60 to 90 days. The effect has been damaging to American exporters, as, under such circumstances, drafts due in August will not be liquidated until November or December. This means a large accumulation of draft indebtedness never contemplated by the shipper. Specie payments were suspended.

Mr. President, in dwelling on this subject a few days ago I gave an instance in which a contract had been made to sell 2,000 sacks of flour to Brazil. They were on the wharf in New York City, and the boat was waiting to take them. The usual course is for a bank in South America to accept, by cablegram, a draft filed with the bill of lading in New York. Just as this boat was about to take on the load word came that the bank, no doubt by reason of the transfer of specie to England or Germany, where the capital of the bank was owned, declined to accept the draft; that an issue of paper money had been provided by the Brazilian Government, amounting, I think, to $170,000,000. The proposed buyer, who had intended to pay by a draft accepted by the bank, stated that he would agree to pay in six months; but the owner of the flour in New York City thought it altogether undesirable to complete such a transaction. He did not wish to take the buyer of the flour as a substitute for the bank; he did not wish to postpone payment for six months; and he feared that an issue of paper money in Brazil would further depreciate their currency. So the flour remained in New York. Now, that instance went forth to the country as an argument that we needed more shipping facilities to South America. The fact is that the ship was ready and probably remained in the harbor for a considerable time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio may have discussed a subject that I am curious about; but if so, I did not hear the discussion. What is the fact as to whether or not there is any great quantity of our goods or products destined for shipment to South American and Central American ports that are being held here in this country because there are not shipping facilities?

Mr. BURTON. I would say in answer to that question that there are less now than ever before. If they are being held here in this country at all, it is because of unsettled conditions in South America and the fear on the part of the would-be sellers in this country that they will not be paid for. As this report says, I repeat, even before the war our export trade to other countries and notably to South America had begun to decrease on account of the prevailing financial distress.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is, the difficulty with reference to our shipments, wherever they exist, is not a lack of shipping?

Mr. BURTON. Not at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But it is due to some other circumstance?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That would seem to pretty effectually dispose of the necessity of this shipping bill, so far as our trade with South America and Central America is concerned.

Now, I want to ask the Senator another question in this connection. Is there any lack of shipping facilities so far as our shipments to European ports are concerned, or is the difficulty with those shipments of another character? For example, it has been stated over and over again in the public press that shipments have taken place from this country to European ports and that the ships in which the goods were conveyed have been held up for indefinite periods owing to the lack of unloading facilities at the ports in Europe to which the goods have been consigned.

If that be true, then does it not indicate that our difficulty, so far as European shipments are concerned, is not due to a lack of shipping facilities, but due to causes which exist in European ports with which this shipping bill can possibly have nothing to do? If we should pass a shipping bill, of course it would not remedy the conditions which exist in European ports; and I again ask the Senator from Ohio whether or not, so far as our shipments to European ports are concerned, there is any lack of shipping facilities?

Mr. BURTON. I would say there was somewhat of a scarcity of ships, due, in a measure, to the internment of the whole mercantile marine of Germany, a part of it in their own country and a part of it scattered in other ports over the earth. Then, again, a number of ships have been requisitioned by the French or English Governments. A certain number of ships, also, have been sunk. But how the shipping bill can improve that condition at all I can not see.

The Senator from Utah has stated one reason which some shipping men say is worse than all the rest, namely, the delay in loading and unloading in foreign ports. I dwelt on that in my remarks on the 7th of January, though not very fully. I gave as an illustration the case of the ship Missouri that went over with horses, but had an available cargo of 8,000 tons of freight to a port of France. She did not dare, notwithstanding the remunerative rates, to carry that 8,000 tons or any part of it, because information came to her managers that one boat in the same harbor had been held 60 days in discharging her cargo and getting out.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So if we should pass this bill and thereby add to the number of ships that can carry goods from our ports, the difficulty which the Senator is speaking about would not be obviated.

Mr. BURTON. I do not see how we can get any more ships unless we get the interned ships, which raises a question of neutrality immediately.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator understands that it is impossible to unload within any reasonable time. Is it not true that the number of ships now engaged in carrying goods to these foreign ports——

Mr. BURTON. Without a very great period of delay.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If we add to the number of ships we will get more ships started from American ports, but is it likely while this condition exists that we will be able to get any more goods unloaded in European ports?

Mr. BURTON. Naturally the more ships you have the more freight you could send. I presume in the ports of Bremen or Hamburg, if a ship could get in, regardless of mines, although there would be very great danger, the unloading might be fairly prompt. The instances of delay which have been brought to my attention have been in the ports of England and France. There is an utter abandonment of all foreign trade in the harbors of Bremen and Hamburg, perhaps Stettin and others. There is not the same condition there.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, I wish to ask the Senator another question. It has been stated that one of the reasons for the passage of this bill is that ocean freight rates have been very greatly increased. Obviously that condition must be due in a large measure to the disturbed condition owing to this world's war, to the risks that are incident to the shipping business under these conditions, the increased insurance rates, and a variety of circumstances of that character. If I understand the situation, this bill with its appropriation of $10,000,000, even if we used the money in the purchase of some of these interned vessels, could not restore to the sea one-fifth of the vessels that have been interned.

Mr. BURTON. No; it would not be one-fifth of those that have been interned; it would be much less than that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is, those that have been in one form or another retired from the mercantile carrying trade.

Mr. BURTON. It would be much less than that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It would be much less than one-fifth. That being so, what is the Senator's view——

Mr. BURTON. That would include the whole of the German and Austro-Hungarian marine that are interned at home or in foreign ports.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We may add the ships which have been taken from the carrying trade and are being used in the military operations of these various countries. The number of ships that we would restore to the ocean for the carrying trade by reason of this bill would be almost negligible, however, when compared with the number which are in one manner or another retired. Now, does the Senator think that to put those few ships into the carrying trade would have any great effect upon ocean freight rates?

Mr. BURTON. The effect would be slight; it would not cure a situation which is most exceptional—indeed, extraordinary in its nature. Let me repeat what I said a few days ago. We are at peace here in America, and blest we are. So many people do not realize what is meant by this world war. They expect things to move on just as they would in normal times. The seas near these great ports are strewn with mines, and ships are out for prizes, detaining ships, just as they are liable to be detained in all wars. We ought to be aroused and awakened when we are considering legislation to a consideration of the conditions of the time.

I want to add to what the Senator from Utah said that I do not see how the United States Government is going to obtain any ships from foreign owners. Certainly it would go right into the teeth of international difficulties if it did. Private owners might be able to purchase and run them with less danger of complications than the Government could.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What the Senator has said about that brings me to this suggestion, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. First of all, the President's message——

Mr. BURTON. The first proposition that was made here pointed, just as the compass points to the North Pole, to the building up of trade with Central and South America, which I have endeavored to show, was entirely without any reason.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. In just a minute. I want to run down that South American proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. My question was with reference to one put a moment ago by the Senator from Utah. I think the Senator from Ohio ought to consider what I am about to suggest probably before the Senator from Utah puts his second question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah assumed in his question that under this bill the corporation to be organized could buy only $30,000,000 worth of ships.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Ten million dollars.

Mr. BURTON. Ten million dollars of stock and $30,000,000 of bonds. The stock may be increased, however.

Mr. CUMMINS. The corporation is to be organized with a capital of $10,000,000. The shipping board is to buy $30,000,000 worth of ships and sail them or transfer them to the corporation to be organized, taking the obligations of the corporation for the purchase price. I assume that the $10,000,000 which constitutes the capital of the corporation will be needed in the enterprise itself. At least that such money will be needed to enable them to carry on the business which it is proposed they shall carry on, although they might of course use that money in the purchase of ships.

Mr. BURTON. I thought the Senator from Iowa was going to say used in the preliminary organization.

Mr. CUMMINS. Possibly. I think probably it will be expended in the preliminary organization. But what the Senator from Utah fails to perceive apparently, at least that is the way I look at it, is that this corporation which is thus to be organized can buy $200,000,000 of ships, if it desires to do it, and has the credit which will enable it to do it. It can buy all the ships that ply between American ports and foreign ports if the persons who own those ships are willing to give it the credit. So we are putting afloat here an enterprise which will not only have $30,000,000 of ships but, if people can be induced to trade with it, it can have the largest fleet of ships known to the history of mankind.

Inasmuch as the Government is the majority stockholder in this extraordinary corporation to be created, there will a certain strength be added to the credit of the corporation which will enable it to make these purchases, and, without any guidance, without any direction, without any supervision, this corporation is to go into this business to any extent that it may see fit to do so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Iowa is correct about that, and I have no doubt he is, we have conferred by this bill upon the shipping board the most extraordinary powers that Congress has ever undertaken to confer.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is nothing like it known in the history not only of this country but any other. You may search all the records of any country in the world and you will find no such proposal or any proposal approaching this one.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That illustrates the thorough unwisdom of the manner in which this bill has been formulated and brought to the Senate. There has been no hearing upon it, no one has had any opportunity of digesting its provisions and coming before the committees and expressing his views with reference to it. I have been looking hurriedly over the bill since the Senator from Iowa rose to his feet. I find this provision on page 2 of the bill:

The shipping board, with the approval of the President—

I should like very much to have the attention of the Democratic side of the Chamber to this extraordinary provision of the bill. I see the leader of the Democracy upon the other side giving his attention.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest to the Senator that the other side is not well represented.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has just come in, and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], which makes three Democratic Senators upon that side. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has just appeared, which makes four.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I would say that I was unavoidably called out of the Chamber for a few moments.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have no doubt the entire Democratic side has been unavoidably called out.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not complaining of that; I am simply commenting upon it.

Mr. POMERENE. I recognize the fact that the Senator is usually very diligent, and particularly when anything of a political nature is on hand; but I think I am in the Chamber quite as many hours as my distinguished friend from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The junior Senator from Ohio is one of the most faithful attendants upon the sessions of the Senate. He is nearly always here, and he is here upon this extraordinary occasion when nearly all his fellows have fled. So my criticism is not directed to the Senator from Ohio at all. Now the Democratic side seems to be fairly well represented, there being some six or seven present, and I desire to invite their attention to this extraordinary provision in the bill:

The shipping board——

Mr. POMERENE. If it is not asking a question which calls for some peculiarly private information——

Mr. BURTON. My colleague I do not think has a right to speak here without asking who has the floor.

Mr. POMERENE. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. BURTON. I shall be most pleased to yield for a question.

Mr. POMERENE. I am very grateful to my colleague. I just wondered whether the rather unusually large number of Republican Senators were invited in in order to hear this particular colloquy at this time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. To hear the colloquy on the part of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POMERENE. The query occurred to my mind why it was that there happened to be more than the usual number of Republicans present at this time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think there is more than the number of Republican Senators who are usually present; there is a fairly good attendance.

Mr. POMERENE. I think there are 11 Republicans in the Chamber now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Last night there was only one.

Mr. POMERENE. I remember the other evening when we tried to have a session in the evening to take up the calendar under a unanimous-consent agreement there were just about enough Republicans here to raise the question of the lack of a quorum and, of course, to defeat the legislation which otherwise would have taken place at that time. Last night, I believe, there was one Republican in the Chamber when we were seeking to get a quorum.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. At what time?

Mr. POMERENE. About 6 o'clock.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Democrats having a majority of this body, they were unable to muster a quorum. The provision, if I may go back to it, to which I desire to invite the attention particularly of the Democratic side is that—

The shipping board, with the approval of the President, may consent to or may cause an increase of the capital stock from time to time as the interests of the corporation may require, but the United States shall subscribe for 51 per cent of each and every such increase.

I venture to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that no such extraordinary provision has ever been found in a piece of legislation heretofore. We are undertaking by that to confer upon a mere administrative board the power in effect to appropriate as much money out of the Treasury of the United States as they may desire.

I had always understood that it was the peculiar function of Congress to look after the appropriations from the National Treasury, and while we do to a limited extent authorize executive officers to incur expenses, I do not recall that any such power as this has ever heretofore been conferred upon any executive officer or upon any administrative board. We might just as well pass a bill in the first instance providing that the amount of the capital stock shall be fixed by this board without any limit whatever, because we have given them unlimited authority, if they choose to exert it, to increase the capital stock of this corporation to $100,000,000 or to $200,000,000. There is absolutely no limit.

Mr. BURTON. That is certainly true. The powers granted are unprecedented.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The question that I desire to propound to the Senator from Ohio I have not yet had an opportunity to state.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Upon this excursion into a new field I notice the President in his now famous Indianapolis speech said, speaking to his audience:

> Do you know, gentlemen, that the ocean freight rates have gone up in some instances to ten times their ordinary figure, and that the farmers of the United States—those who raise grain and those who raise cotton, these things that are absolutely necessary to the world as well as to ourselves—can not get any profit out of the great prices that they are willing to pay for these things on the other side of the sea because the whole profit is eaten up by the extortionate charges for ocean carriage? In the midst of this the Democrats propose a temporary measure of relief in a shipping bill.

The query I have had in my mind, that I desired to propound to the Senator, is this: Undoubtedly the ocean freights have been increased, as the President says. Whether they have been increased to the extent which the President names may be open to question, but they have been increased to some extent.

In the face of that there are some ships interned and some ships that are not now in the carrying trade, which the private capital of our people have an opportunity of acquiring. This shipping bill has been talked about now for a considerable period of time.

Mr. BURTON. It has not been very much discussed here in the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I mean it has been talked about so that the people of the country understood that the administration was contemplating the passage of such a bill, a bill which would put the Government of the United States into the shipping business. Of course, if the United States Government goes into the shipping business that will discourage private capital from going into that same business.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Because private capital must realize that it can not compete upon equal terms with the Government of the United States and particularly——

Mr. BURTON. Private capital certainly would not go in in case the Government went in.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No.

Mr. BURTON. The Government might charge lower rates. At any rate there would be great uncertainty as to earnings.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In addition to that——

Mr. BURTON. It is impossible to determine what course would be pursued or what motives would determine the action of such an unprecedented organization as the one here proposed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. BURTON. As soon as the Senator from Utah concludes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The President has already announced that it is expected that this business would be carried on at a loss by the Government, which means probably that the Government would charge unremunerative rates.

Mr. BURTON. Very likely. It might charge rates which would be remunerative under private control but would be unremunerative under Government control.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. At any rate, the statement that the Government expects to carry on this business at a loss certainly would not tend to encourage private capital to venture into the same field.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I had not quite reached the question I desired to propound to the Senator. Is not this threat upon the part of the Government of the United States that it is going to invade this field which has heretofore been given up to private enterprise for the purposes of carrying on business a sufficient threat in and of itself, and has it not operated as a threat for the past months in such a way as to prevent private capital acquiring ships that otherwise might have been acquired and put into the carrying trade of the United States?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; undoubtedly. I think I have already expressed that opinion, Mr. President.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. BURTON. I answer unequivocally not only that it would deter private enterprise, but it has already prevented the investment of private capital in shipping——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I am safe in saying to a larger amount than the amount contemplated originally in this bill, namely, the $10,000,000 for stock and $30,000,000 for bonds. I make the statement with confidence that more than $40,000,000 has been kept out of investment in shipping by private parties by the threat of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. POMERENE. It has been only a matter probably of a month or a little longer since this measure was proposed, and within that time we are advised by my colleague that $40,000,000 has been deterred from going into the shipping industry. Now, what, if anything, was there to deter the $40,000,000, or any other millions of dollars, from going into the shipping business in this country prior to two months ago?

Mr. BURTON. I fear my colleague is altogether under a misapprehension in regard to the facts. The bill was introduced in the House of Representatives on the 24th day of August, and the report was then filed. The word was spread around, and, indeed, it was definitely understood that the bill had the backing of the administration.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that does not answer the question. I think I stand corrected, so far as the House bill was concerned; but let us assume that this controversy began with the introduction of the bill in the House, and that by reason thereof this $40,000,000 was deterred from going into the shipping interest of this country; what was there to deter this $40,000,000 from entering into the shipping industry for the 50 years prior to August 1, 1914? Why is it that, after private enterprise has had all these golden opportunities to invest in the shipping interest of the world, they have not grasped this opportunity, if they are now so eager to do it?

Mr. BURTON. What are the advocates of this bill insisting—the unusual opportunities of the present time, the higher rates, the difference in the relation between demand and supply? Now the shipping business is apparently very profitable.

Furthermore, it was not until last August that we passed a bill allowing ships under foreign registry, with certain exceptions as to age and size, to be transferred to American registry.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am free to concede the proposition that by the liberalization of our registration laws we have improved the shipping facilities very largely; but when the shipping interests, taking advantage of the great needs of our commerce, in the course of several months are willing to double, treble, and even quintuple their rates, I do not know that that kind of private enterprise ought to appeal very much to legislators in the interest of the public.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if the increase of rates in the ocean traffic has been any more than the increase in the rates of the rail traffic that has been forced upon the people of the United States under the command, practically, of this administration by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, perhaps that question is addressed to me; I am not sure. I have seen the statement—and I think it is in one of the reports—to the effect that in many places the ocean rates have been increased ten times the regular rates. So far as the Interstate Commerce Commission rates are concerned, I do not know; that is a great question of economics. I am so constituted mentally that I am not able to have an intelligent idea upon that subject until I shall first have had the opportunity to investigate the question and ascertain whether one rate is too low or another rate is too high. Some men can jump at conclusions, and men who have not had the same opportunity to investigate the subject which the Interstate Commerce Commission has had are, of course, much more capable of determining what is right and what is wrong than are they, just as every man in his experience in the common walks of life recognizes the fact that there are many men who stand on the street corners who know better how cases should be decided in the Supreme Court of the United States than do the Supreme Court judges themselves.

Mr. NELSON and Mr. BRISTOW addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield, and to whom?

Mr. BURTON. I yield first to the Senator from Minnesota, and then I will yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the attention of the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to the fact that in the recent ruling of the Interstate Commerce Commission——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to make the point of order that the senior Senator from Ohio can not yield to other Senators except for them to ask a question of him; and I object.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was under the impression that these interruptions were all in the line of questioning the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. The Chair thinks the Senator from Minnesota is in order in submitting his question.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the attention of both the Senators from Ohio to the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission in their recent decision increasing the rates which might be charged by the railroads did not base their decision on the well-known doctrine which has heretofore prevailed as to the value of the service rendered, but they based it on an entirely new and novel ground, of which we have never before heard, to wit, on the ground that the times were a little dull and hard and that the railroads needed a little more income; that was all—not that the service was worth more or that the railroads were entitled to a higher rate. That is a new doctrine. If that doctrine shall be applied in the future, it will always be a question not as to the value of the service rendered, but as to whether the times are good or bad and as to whether the railroads are or are not making money.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas for a question?

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] seemed to be somewhat irritated, judging from his manner, at my question; but I should like the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], if he is able to do so, to explain why it is that the present national administration seems to be so horrified at the alleged increase in ocean-going rates, while it demands that the Interstate Commerce Commission increase the railroad freight rates of the country? I should like some explanation of the attitude of the administration as between those two great transportation industries.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, to take up first the remarks of my colleague [Mr. POMERENE], who expressed surprise that for these many years men had not entered the shipping business. I wish to say that no one deplores that fact more than do I. I have given much study to the history of our shipping from the earliest days when our proud sailing ships ranked with the best of the boats on the ocean. That is a long story, and I do not wish to go into it now.

In all propositions for the restoration of the American merchant marine, against the judgment of the great majority of my colleagues I have steadfastly opposed any plan for ship subsidy. I regard the reasons for the decadence of the American merchant marine as so deep and so fundamental that none of the propositions for a national subsidy would remedy them. At sometime during this discussion I may wish to express my views upon that question, but I do not wish to digress at this time. After long years of decadence, however, the time came when our navigation laws were liberalized, when our competitors, who had driven us from the sea, were involved in a frightful war. The chance was then offered for us to regain something of that proud position which we occupied a hundred years ago, when our boats sailed over the entire globe, and when every port of any prominence welcomed a ship carrying the American flag at its masthead.

Almost immediately when this opportunity was afforded more than 100 ships under foreign registers were brought under the American flag. Then word comes—from I do not know where, perhaps from the other end of the Avenue—that the Government is going to take over this business. Like a pall of darkness it settled over the hopes of every individual and of every company which was disposed to purchase ships and take out an American register so as to fly the American flag.

They say the rates are four or five times as high as formerly, and that is an extortion. I do not hold any brief for the shipowners; I did not in the days when they asked for subsidy, and I do not now. But I fancy that if any Senator in this body were to complain of these increased rates and should say to one of the old skippers, "Captain, you are charging too much; you are raising your rates to four or five times your former charge for the trip to Bremen," he might say in reply with grim humor, "You just come right up here on the bridge, and when we are going through mine fields on the other side, where for hundreds of miles there may be a mine in every knot or in every quarter of a knot liable to blow you into kingdom come, and you will not complain that the rates are four or five times more than they formely were."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I ask the Senator from Ohio if it is not a fact that one great reason why there has been an increase in ocean rates is that so many vessels are carrying contraband or conditional contraband of war, involving exceptionally high rates of insurance, and also the order of the Treasury Department requiring that the manifests of the cargoes of ships should be concealed for a period of 30 days, so as to give vessels carrying American products an opportunity to ship contraband of war to Europe and get it well on the way before anybody knew what was in the cargo?

Mr. BURTON. I think, Mr. President, that was a most unfortunate step for the administration, though I do not wish to take that up at this moment.

Well, now it is said the rates are ten times as much as they were formerly? Possibly as to one single cargo that has been true. That is a good statement to make on the stump; possibly it is a good argument to use in urging the passage of a shipping bill when there is a lamentable paucity of solid arguments.

Even if there has been an increase of four or five times the former rates, there must be some very substantial reason for it. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has given one—the tendency to violate the laws by carrying contraband—and then I have already pointed out others which, in my judgment, are more important, such, for example, as the existence of mines with which a ship is likely to come in contact when approaching ports to which formerly there was easy access through channels excellently lighted and of ample depth.

In addition to that, there is the delay in waiting for cargo, amounting in some cases, as I said a few moments ago, to as much as 60 days. On the routes where there is no delay, where there are no mines, there has been no notable increase. Perhaps there has been an increase of 10, 15, 20, or even 25 per cent, but it has not by any means been as great as the increase which occurred in a time of profound peace, in the autumn of 1912. Rates went up then more than they have gone up now, except where they are influenced by the abnormal conditions due to the present war.

I hope before we are through with the debate that the unsubstantial claims that are being made and the exaggerated statements of fact will be eliminated and that some reason will be advanced for the passage of this bill that will stand analysis. After carefully studying the whole question it seems to me at times that there must be something concealed about it that the Senate and the country does not yet understand, because it is so easy to show that the reasons which were given at first and those which have been advanced since are without foundation.

Mr. President, I have not quite finished as yet with the discussion of the South American situation in connection with the claim of empty markets. I will resume at the point where I was reading. In this connection, Mr. President, if it can be arranged by the reporters, I ask leave to have this document printed in its entirety without the interruptions, and then let the discussion and interpolations pertaining to it follow after the document itself. I do not wish to impose any impossible task on the reporters, but I should very much prefer to have the pamphlet printed by itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that course will be pursued.

Mr. BURTON. I continue reading from the report of the Latin-American trade committee:

DIFFICULTIES OF SETTLEMENTS FOR SOUTH AMERICAN TRADE.

Since the balance of our trade with South America is heavily against the United States, there should be exchange facilities which would enable our exporters to obtain payment from balances created in New York in settlement for goods imported into this country from South America.

Such balances, however, are not maintained in this country.

The external debt of the South American Republics (Federal, State, and municipal), amounts approximately to $1,632,488,580. The bulk of those funds were borrowed from Great Britain. South America therefore invariably has payments to make in London.

The greater part of South American banking business, moreover, is conducted by British-owned institutions. These facts, together with the facilities offered by the London discount market, have induced German and other European-owned banks trading in South America to maintain London agencies Sterling credits, therefore, have been the basis of South American trade.

Our exports to and imports from Latin America are shipped direct. They are, however (almost exclusively in South American trade and largely in Central American trade), paid for in sterling bills of exchange.

United States exporters have, in the past, converted their dollars into sterling at the rate of the day, drawing against their South American customers at 90 days' sight, payable in 90-day bills on London. Importers have accepted 90-day sterling bills, which they have liquidated at the current rate of exchange. This has necessitated the conversion of dollars into sterling in the United States and a reconversion in South America from sterling into the currency of the buying country.

Thus, although the balance of the South American trade of the United States has been increasingly heavy against this country, we do not make settlement direct. We have been obliged, either by the shipment of gold or goods, to settle this adverse balance by remitting to England either gold or goods to meet interest charges on the South American debt and to pay for goods purchased in Europe by the South American countries.

Recent attempts to establish direct exchange with South America have not been successful in relieving the trade congestion incident to the dislocation of London exchange. A few New York banking institutions have been ready to extend accommodation to American exporters, but the credits available have been wholly inadequate. This fact, together with the difficulty of making collections in South America, has seriously embarrassed our exporters, while our importers, finding it practically impossible to dispose of New York bills to bankers in South America, have been penalized by the almost prohibitive cost of London credits

PRESENT PROBLEMS.

(1) Because of the war the Latin-American countries are confronted by the necessity—

(a) Of marketing their products despite the shrinkage of world purchasing power.

(b) Of obtaining funds to move crops and to continue indispensable industrial and agricultural development normally financed by Europe.

(2) The United States is confronted—

(a) By the necessity of holding its normal export trade with Latin America.

(b) By the possibility of increasing that trade by filling Latin-American needs for merchandise hitherto purchased in Europe, which Europe can not now supply.

The solution of these problems depends upon—

(1) Production.

(2) Transportation—shipping and insurance.

(3) Financing: (a) Of production, (b) of transportation, (c) of settlements.

Production in the United States can be maintained if there be a sufficient market at home and abroad for American goods. Production in South America may continue, but can not be further developed unless financial assistance be obtained.

There is the crux of the whole matter, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Is the Senator aware of the manner in which some of the neutral countries have met the difficulty of the exchange situation which tied up the exports of this country for quite a while? Our American shippers were unwilling to ship their goods abroad until they were assured of their pay, and because of the condition of exchange in Europe they were placed in an embarrassing and difficult situation. There are some Governments which have met the situation, the pioneer Government in this respect being that of the little country of Norway. Representatives of that nation came over to the United States and secured a loan of $3,000,000 upon the condition that 80 per cent of that amount was to be left in the banks of the city of New York to be drawn against in payment for American products purchased in this country. Sweden afterwards followed with a $6,000,000 loan on the same basis. Subsequently, I think, Greece followed with a $12,000,000 loan; and lately Russia has likewise negotiated a loan of, I think, twenty-five or thirty million dollars. All these loans have been made in such a way that, while money is ostensibly borrowed from the banks of this country, the funds are left here, to be drawn against in payment for American products. None of the South American countries have taken such a step, and until they do there will be no commerce with them. It will be congested because of the exchange situation in those countries.

Mr. BURTON. I was aware of the course pursued by Norway and by Sweden, and I think it was a very wise precaution. Each of those countries realized that there might be urgent need for products of the United States, and to guard against any derangement in the exchange system it was thought best to have the money here ready for such a situation.

The South American countries, however, have not a surplus of resources that will enable them to adopt such a plan, and, as stated in this report, they are compelled more and more to depend upon their own products. In this connection I repeat the statement:

Production in the United States can be maintained if there be a sufficient market at home and abroad for American goods. Production in South America may continue, but can not be further developed unless financial assistance be obtained.

That is, they have relied so much on loans in the past that, with the breakdown of credits and the financial disturbance there, they must depend upon their own products now even more than before.

It seems to me that some who have discussed this question would have done well to read the report by this committee—made up of leading exporters and others familiar with South American trade—before expressing themselves. I do not think anyone familiar with the facts stated in the following paragraph would have made the accusation of being ignorant or being misguided against those who oppose the purchase of ships by the Government to stimulate the South American trade:

At the present time steamships are available and sailing regularly from this country to the principal ports of Latin America and from those ports to the United States. Many of these vessels are unable to obtain full cargoes. Although only a limited number are under the United States flag, the above will clearly indicate to exporters, importers, and manufacturers that they need not hold back from entering the field on this account.

This report of Secretary Redfield's committee distinctly says that those who are engaged in the trade need not hesitate because of any doubt as to the sufficiency of shipping.

Before trade can resume its normal course the exchange problem must be solved, either by the restoration of the old or by establishment of new credit facilities.

NEW CREDIT MACHINERY NEEDED.

Old methods may no longer be serviceable in the situation which will result from the readjustment following the war. It should now be possible, indeed, in the mutual interest of the Latin-American Republics and ourselves, to create new credit machinery to perform the functions of the old, and which will at the same time rid us, at least partially, of a dependence upon the London credits and European financial markets, which, though essential in the past, has proved to be seriously embarrassing.

Deprived of the European loans with which their resources were being developed, Latin-American countries are now undergoing a serious curtailment of industry and development. The consequences in many instances will be serious not only to these countries themselves but also to the countries which expected to supply the materials.

It has been increasingly the practice of European bankers to stipulate the use of European material in the projects which they financed. Latin America is now turning to the United States for funds. This country is hardly in a position to undertake considerable investments at the present time, but industries with an already considerable trade at stake may well consider the necessity of protecting that trade by obtaining for their customers some relief from the present stringency. Such investments, if judiciously made, would yield an ultimate fair return and meanwhile provide a market for American materials which can not now be sold.

The question of creating a market for Latin-American securities in the United States, therefore, is highly important. The development of our trade with those countries is largely dependent on its satisfactory solution.

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMERCIAL CREDITS MOST IMPORTANT.

Unless the restriction of commercial credits be remedied, however, we will not only be unable to extend our trade, but we will lose a considerable portion of that which we already have.

Nowhere does this article sound much like a story of empty markets. It is as far from that as possible. They are in financial straits down there. Instead of there being a demand for more of our goods, instead of there being any occasion for putting on shipping lines, they say, "Unless the restriction of commercial credits be remedied * * * we will lose a considerable portion of that which we already have."

In these days when accusations of ignorance, blindness, and of being misguided are used so conspicuously I wish that documents like this, which exhaust the subject, might be read more generally. This was not prepared by the shipping people; it was not prepared by Republicans, but by a committee appointed by the Secretary of Commerce in this city, and if ever there was an absolute refutation from men who are thoroughly posted on this subject, an absolute destruction of every argument for the pending policy or measure, it is in this procedure.

Compare that with the following excerpt from page 4 of the President's message:

It is of equal consequence that the nations whom Europe has usually supplied with innumerable articles of manufacture and commerce, of which they are in constant need and without which their economic development halts and stands still, can now get only a small part of what they formerly imported, and eagerly look to us to supply their all but empty markets.

In the light of actual conditions in South America that expression "empty markets" is absurd.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BURTON (reading)—

This is particularly true of our own neighbors, the States, great and small, of Central and South America. Their lines of trade have hitherto run chiefly athwart the seas, not to our ports, but to the ports of Great Britain and of the older Continent of Europe. I do not stop to inquire why or to make any comment on probable causes. What interests us just now is not the explanation, but the fact, and our duty and opportunity in the presence of it. Here are markets which we must supply, and we must find the means of action.

Then, on page 5, the President speaks of the errors in the development of our merchant marine, and urges this system of Government purchase of vessels as a remedy. It is evident that he had South America in mind:

Therefore I propose another way of providing the means of transportation, which must needs precede, not tardily follow, the development of our trade with our neighbor States of America.

Not a word about these trans-Atlantic routes, the trade to France or to England or to Germany, but "our neighbor States of America." So far as transportation facilities to our neighbor States of America are concerned they are about as well provided for now as they ever were; and the fault is not in lack of shipping, for practically every boat that points its prow in that direction goes with a large amount of empty space, due entirely to other causes which I wish had been examined and appreciated. And that might have been done before this measure was introduced. The reading of this document alone would have given a full understanding of the situation.

I will resume reading, on page 9:

The present effort to secure cooperation of American bankers in massing a gold fund to satisfy our obligations abroad by promising to cause London exchange again to approach normal, will lessen to the American importer the expense of liquidating in London his South American indebtedness. It will nevertheless give effect to the old alienation of the selling power we should derive from purchases of South American products. Liquidation of our South American indebtedness in London will pay for British exports to Latin America, at a time when American merchandise, intimidated by moratoria, remains congested on our docks. Our available money will serve Great Britain's effort to capture South American markets vacated, perforce, by Germany.

Whenever there is a great disturbance of the world's finances, American exporters and importers in South American trade are injured, because of their dependence on London. This has happened four times in 25 years.

So long as South America must meet interest settlements in London by shipment of goods to the United States, under the old three-cornered system, our South American trade must, to a certain degree, depend upon London exchange.

But in view of the facts above mentioned, it has seemed to your committee that the need for independence, emphasized by the present situation, should be recognized. We feel that an attempt should now be made to evolve some plan whereby we might take advantage of our large direct trade with Latin America to make a market for bills drawn in dollars, and establish a direct exchange, not with the view to eliminating sterling credits now or later, but in order to provide an exchange channel which will supplement, offset, or compete with London, and be available in an emergency when London exchange is disorganized.

The maintenance of exchange relations depends on a credit machinery and reciprocal balances. This machinery will partially be provided under the Federal reserve act, which permits American banks to open branches abroad and permits a rediscount in this country of commercial paper, based on shipments of commodities in foreign trade. These steps, however, have not yet been effected, and your committee appreciating that the installation of this machinery may require considerable time, has considered means for temporary relief.

These means are in a measure superseded by the establishment of a bank, at least in one country of South America, as a branch of an American institution. However, I will read the plan that is proposed:

COOPERATIVE EXCHANGE AS EMERGENCY MEASURE.

A plan for the establishment of a merchants' "cooperative exchange," or clearing house for Latin-American trade, has been proposed. This, it has been suggested, would enable importers and exporters of goods to and from Latin-America to watch credits, balances to be remitted on certain definite settling dates. The chief argument for such an institution is that it would bring together exporters and importers among whom there is now no cohesion. Both know their cash requirements each month. If the exporters require say $5,000,000 to pay for their October shipments to Brazil, and the importers a like amount to pay for their imports from Brazil, such an exchange might be able easily to liquidate transactions in New York.

The plan, however, is open to serious objection for the following reasons:

First. The necessity and difficulty of securing the cooperation of a sufficient number of importers and exporters.

Second. The necessity and difficulty of standardizing credits.

Third. The difficulty of reaching an agreement as to the rate of exchange between South American currency and United States dollars.

Fourth. The difficulty due to the seasonal variations of shipments of South American produce and the consequent fluctuation in the demand for balances in New York or South America.

Fifth. The disorganized financial situation in South America, which increases the risk in securing settlements in the South American Republics.

Sixth. The necessity of creating and maintaining an expert and, therefore, expensive organization.

The difficulty as regards South America, however, would still remain, for it would be impossible within any reasonable time to organize in the principal cities of South America sufficiently extensive cooperative associations and importers and exporters of American products.

Standardization of South American credits, therefore, could only be secured by the guaranty of American shippers or importers, or by the guaranty of the South American Governments themselves.

Your committee, therefore, after careful consideration, feels that the suggested "cooperative exchange" would not be practical, although a powerful banking group or large banking institution willing to assist in maintaining and developing our Latin-American trade might be able to secure and render mutually beneficial the organized cooperation of exporters and importers in matching credits.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

Your committee, however, believes that the extension of credits might be facilitated and some relief afforded pending the establishment of the Federal reserve banks if, in addition to permitting national banks which have signified their intention to enter the reserve associations to accept commercial paper, action be taken by the Federal Reserve Board to make immediately effective the rediscount provision of the new banking system, thus assuring early establishment of a discount market.

Your committee, while appreciating the necessity of conserving the banking resources of this country for the protection of our domestic situation, nevertheless believes that the cessation or curtailment of our trade with Latin America will in itself be highly injurious to American industry, just as we believe that the extension of this trade would make for the prosperity of the country at large, as well as of those directly interested. We therefore hope that American banking institutions may be induced to meet the present emergency, not by tentative and inadequate measures, but by extending accommodation sufficient at least to assure the maintenance of our already established trade.

There is not a sanguine note in this report, Mr. President. It is to be noted here that they express the hope that by measures to be taken our already established trade may be maintained. On the other hand, I trust that in the future our trade to South America will greatly increase.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that while it is claimed that there has been a great depletion in our ocean shipping, yet that has not been as great as the depletion in the international ocean commerce.

Mr. BURTON. I believe I dwelt on that subject somewhat the first day I spoke—on January 7.

Mr. NELSON. I want to quote what the Commissioner of Navigation says on that subject:

The lessened production and the loss of vessels will be more than offset, however, by the great reduction in the volume of international trade by sea during the war and during the period of recuperation.

While the war has eliminated the German shipping and practically the Russian shipping, and to a limited extent the Swedish shipping, yet the oversea trade that we had with Germany, with Austria, and with Russia has also practically been eliminated; from the fact that the Turks control the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus, there is no communication with Russia in the Black Sea, and the fact that the Gulf of Finland and the Baltic have been mined; so that Russia, with the exception of the single port of Archangel, is absolutely cut off, as much as Germany and Austria. The loss of international trade from these sources far exceeds in pro rata quantity the loss of shipping as an incident to the war. I want to call the Senator's attention to that fact. Unfortunately, I did not hear the Senator the first day he spoke.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I do not believe anyone can tell whether the decrease in commerce keeps pace with the decrease in shipping. I examined some figures on that subject a couple of weeks ago, and they showed that the percentage of the whole tonnage of the world owned by citizens of the German Empire was just about the same as their percentage of the total world's trade—some 10 to 12 per cent; I do not recall the exact figures. Then, as stated in this report—or did the Senator himself state that?—there is the closing of a part of the trade from Sweden.

Mr. NELSON. I called attention to that. That is not in the report. I simply referred to what I marked in pencil in the margin.

Mr. BURTON. Then there is the very obvious elimination of Turkish and Russian commerce by the closing of the Dardanelles and the mining of the Gulf of Finland, there being only two routes left for commerce into Russia—the one to Archangel on the north, which during the winter season is probably closed by ice, and the other to Vladivostock, at the easterly end of the Russian possessions in Asia.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio further yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I stated a moment ago that, among other things, a part of the Swedish shipping had also been affected by the war.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; there is no doubt of that.

Mr. NELSON. It has been affected partly because the Germans have strewn mines on both sides of the Baltic, and also in the Gulf of Bothnia, at the Aland Islands, and in the Gulf of Finland; but, worst of all, what has affected the Swedes more is this: They ship a good deal of timber by water from that country, and the German Government has declared timber to be contraband of war in order to prevent England getting the timber.

Mr. BURTON. What is the great port in northeasterly Prussia—Malmo?

Mr. NELSON. No, sir; it is a port farther up, north of Stockholm.

Mr. BURTON. This is in East Prussia.

Mr. NELSON. No; it is in Sweden.

Mr. BURTON. There is a port over there at the very northerly end of East Prussia, where they import timber on an enormous scale.

Mr. NELSON. Memel?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; Memel—that is it.

Mr. NELSON. And Konigsberg. Konigsberg and Memel are ports, and there is another little port by the name of Labiau. Then there is another port in Swedish Pomerania, Stralsund, that used to be a Swedish city in old times.

Mr. BURTON. Because of making timber contraband of war, no doubt that trade is almost entirely shut off.

To resume, I think it would be almost impossible to judge of the comparative falling off of the commerce of the world and the falling off in the quantity of shipping available. Probably there is a certain degree of equality between the two, but there are such uncertainties that you can make no reliable calculation.

On the 7th of January I pointed to the fact that larger supplies were required by the countries whose armies were in the field, which in certain branches increased importation and commerce; also, that some of the countries near the theater of war, but not directly involved in the struggle, were accumulating supplies in order to provide against emergencies. But the most decisive feature in the influence upon shipping rates is not that of interned shipping—shipping that has been put under military requisition—it is in the delay in ports and harbors, the danger of seizure, and the mining of channels. Those factors combined have very naturally put up freight rates altogether beyond the normal scale.

To resume reading:

EXTENSION OF TRADE.

The question of extending American commerce with Latin America depends primarily, as does the problem of maintaining our trade, upon the establishment of commercial credits, upon our ability to finance Latin-American enterprise, purchase the products of its soil and industries and upon the perfection of our selling machinery.

Your committee has not attempted to formulate suggestions as to the manner in which the individual manufacturer should proceed to establish a market for his products in South America. Nor does it here dwell upon the importance of adaptation of the product to the needs of the market for proper packing. Too high praise can not be given the Government, particularly the Department of Commerce, under the Hon. W. C. Redfield, for its effective propaganda on these essential points and for its efforts adequately to assist extension of our foreign trade.

The enlightened services of the Pan American Union in safeguarding good understanding among the republics of the Western Hemisphere, and in making its information and advice available to all affected by the commercial problems arising at this juncture are worthy of the warmest commendation.

CAUTION NOW ADVISABLE.

Your committee feels, however, that merchants and manufacturers now contemplating an entry into the Latin-American field should be careful to avail themselves of the easily accessible information concerning these markets. It is suggested that they should at the outset remember that the cost of maintaining individual representatives would probably be too great for any one of them to bear themselves. It is therefore suggested that associations consisting of the smaller firms or corporations engaged in kindred lines of production might be formed, and that either one or more representatives should be sent to South America to look after the interests of such associations, thereby bringing the cost of representation within a reasonable limit.

Mr. President, I doubt whether this arrangement would be allowable under the antitrust law. One disadvantage of our exporters has been that large-scale operations are practically essential to gain any foothold in the foreign market, save in the case of specialties; that an organization which furnishes articles for the South American trade must be able to respond quickly to the demands, and must have a variety in the wares which it can furnish, and an ample supply. The Germans provide for that by their cartels; the English, instead of discouraging, encourage that sort of thing; but with us it is contrary to the law. It can not be done.

I should be far from advocating, as at present advised, a repeal of the antitrust law; but it seems to me it is absolutely essential for our foreign trade that our laws should be so framed that this recommendation could be carried out. We are brought in competition with the whole world. Every other country permits these sales agencies which represent a number of different firms and corporations, including competitors. No single institution, unless a very vast one, can afford to maintain selling agencies generally throughout South America or any other country.

It has been suggested that American manufacturers should combine to send to South America trade exhibits, showing the various articles which they have for sale. Your committee, however, is not inclined to feel that such measures would be productive of any permanent results. It is suggested instead that manufacturers and dealers desiring to place their products in Latin America, and who, for any reason, prefer not to send their own representatives there, could establish connections with export houses already doing business in those countries and maintaining large branch offices in the principal South American cities fully equipped with efficient sales organizations or who have established connections, and in certain lines of goods—foodstuffs, notions, and miscellaneous articles—join in establishing what might be called for want of a better name an "American store" in certain of the most important cities.

Ventures of this sort, however, require considerable capital and experienced men, and for the sake of the ultimate development of mutually beneficial commercial relations with Latin America it is believed that our merchants and manufacturers should not attempt to install their own establishments in Latin America unless they are prepared to meet initial losses and disappointments before realizing even moderate profits in what must necessarily be a developing, rather than a ready-made, business.

That fact seems to have been overlooked in the communications that have been sent in here and in the reports and arguments. The trade in South America is not born full-fledged. It does not spring like Minerva from the brain of Zeus. It is a warning that our merchants and manufacturers should not go into the business unless they are prepared to meet losses and disappointments—before realizing even moderate profits in what must necessarily be a developing rather than a ready-made business.

Your committee begs, therefore, to summarize the results of the investigations and to state its belief that the present disorganization of the trade of the United States with Latin America may best be remedied and placed on a permanently satisfactory basis as follows:

1. The establishment of a dollar exchange.

(a) By the ultimate creation of a discount market.

(b) Pending the establishment of a discount market by the extension of adequate accommodations by banking institutions and the establishment of reciprocal balances in the United States and in Latin America for financing Latin-American trade.

2. Perfection of our selling machinery.

(a) By furnishing additional support to commission houses already familiar with Latin-American business.

(b) By forming associations of merchants and manufacturers to be jointly represented in Latin America.

(c) By obtaining information as to the possibilities of developing retail stores in large Latin-American cities.

I repeat, Mr. President, I have gone into this subject with reference to South America so elaborately because it was represented to Congress as the main reason for the establishment of a Government shipping line. The initial message recommended it. There was no "elsewhere." There was no other country mentioned except our neighbor States of America. That did not mean Canada, because the great majority of our transportation there is by rail.

Here is this document, which I submit is one of the ablest ever prepared on the subject of foreign trade, in which its authors not only say not one word about the need of any additional mercantile marine but they say that merchants and manufacturers need not fear to go into business because of any apprehension on that score, there being a plentiful supply. I read this again. I can not reiterate it too often, because it is the very substance of the whole thing, and I would that all my colleagues understood it:

At the present time steamships are available and sailing regularly from this country to the principal ports of Latin America and from those ports to the United States. Many of these vessels are unable to obtain full cargoes. Although only a limited number are under the United States flag the above will clearly indicate to exporters, importers, and manufacturers that they need not hold back from entering the field on this account.

Mr. President, I am inclined to think that it would not be practicable for me to have this printed as a whole as a part of my remarks. But I ask leave that this pamphlet of some 11 pages, giving the report of the committee appointed by Secretary Redfield, entitled "Latin American Trade," be printed as a public document. (S. Doc. No. 714.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was printed for the Committee on Commerce, was it not?

Mr. BURTON. I think not. I think this print comes from the Pan American Bureau. There is no mark on it.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; but it says "Printed for the use of the Committee on Commerce." I think I have the same document the Senator has, entitled "Latin American Trade."

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was printed for the use of the Committee on Commerce. That committee perhaps would not have many copies, and I have no objection to having it printed as a document.

Mr. BURTON. I believe the Senator from Florida will agree with me that it is one of the most valuable documents on the subject of foreign trade that was ever printed at any time.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is quite a valuable document. I had that impression and it was for that reason the committee had it printed.

Mr. BURTON. I fancy there will be no objection to a revocation of the order made that it be printed. The more I think of it the more I think it impracticable to separate it from my remarks. The reporters will in any event have to insert it just as it was read, with the interruptions.

There is one point with regard to the trade with South America that I do not seem to have touched upon, and that is the diversity of that trade by reason of the production of both tropical fruits and of those of the Temperate Zone. Of course, it must be borne in mind that different conditions prevail in our trade with tropical countries from those which will prevail in Argentina and countries in the South Temperate Zone. In one case those of the South Temperate Zone are competitors of ours and they buy of us only such articles as machinery, agricultural implements, and so forth, as we can furnish to an advantage in comparison with other countries. In the other case, that of the tropical countries, our trade is very largely increasing.

One of the most remarkable features, not only in our trade but in the trade of other countries, has been the increased consumption of the tropical products. When the tariff act was pending here the Senate Committee on Finance inserted in the bill a provision for a duty on bananas. I thought that most unwise. Not only was it the food of a large class of our population, but trade was growing enormously in this article with certain Central and West Indian and South American countries, and it would impose an objectionable restriction. I am glad to say that, although this amendment was adopted by a very slim majority—I think by only 2 in the Senate—it was left out in conference, and no duty is imposed under the existing law.

This is but one illustration of the increase in the use of tropical and subtropical products in the United States, which is sure to increase the importance of our commercial relations with those countries of South America which furnish these fruits and products.

In this connection, Mr. President, I will read to the Senate an article on South America by a gentleman who formerly was in the Consular Service but now is the agent of the Lloyd Brazileiro in New York City. I read this particularly because he not only is thoroughly familiar with the situation but dwells upon the preference of the shippers in this regard. It has been alleged all along that, as a matter of course, the boat owners are opposed to this bill. The fact of the matter is that some of them are not. They rather like the idea. They think the Government will go into the business and find the results so disappointing that in a little while they will want to charter the boats or sell them, and then there will be an opportunity better than the bargain counter.

But it is maintained that a Government-owned line would benefit the shippers—those who have freight to forward. Mr. President, I think you will find that shippers very generally are opposed to this bill also. Indeed, I have known of no petitions of shippers coming in here in favor of this measure.

This communication is addressed to Hon. J. W. ALEXANDER, Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House of Representatives, dated December 31, 1914:

> MY DEAR JUDGE ALEXANDER: You may recall that I was among those who testified before your committee about two years ago, concerning the steamship combination in the trade between Brazil and this country. It occurs to me that possibly an analysis of certain features of the present shipping question might serve some advantageous purpose before your committee. Permit me first to make clear the exact relation of my company to the present situation. I represent the Lloyd Brazileiro in the United States. My company is owned and operated directly by the Federal Government of Brazil. Since the beginning of the war we have increased our service, both with Brazilian tonnage and neutral vessels which we have chartered. Our situation is radically different from that of most steamship companies, in that this concern is not only a carrier but a very large shipper.

I have already, Mr. President, called attention to the fact that especially in the trade with South America the business of the merchant or shipper is in many instances sometimes of necessity combined with that of the shipowner:

> Since August we have shipped so largely for our own account that the total of our purchases for export has, in point of tonnage, exceeded the total shipments to Brazil of any other three exporting concerns. We have, therefore, a direct and vital interest in the reduction of freight rates, at the same time that we are interested, as carriers, in the increase of such rates. In other words, what we particularly desire is to obtain tonnage for charter at rates which will permit us to operate the same at a profit and at the same time obtain cheap transportation for our own exports.
> Of coal alone we have exported 50,000 tons for our own account and have 20,000 tons ready to move, for which we can not obtain the necessary vessels at rates which will permit us to ship the coal. Neutral tonnage which we have had chartered at $8,000 per month is not now available for recharter at less than $18,000 per month. In spite of this fact, we are continuing to carry practically all cargo offered by outside shippers for shipment to Brazil, using therefor our own vessels and in some cases even chartered ships rather than refusing the cargo to provide space for our own exports.
> No doubt the question will arise as to how we would fare in this respect if there were American bottoms available for charter. In answer to this query I will state that at the time when rates were still low, when we could obtain a given vessel at the rate of $8,000 per month, it was a common experience to have owners of American vessels offer tonnage almost exactly the equivalent of the other neutrals which we were chartering at $25,000 per month. How is it conceivable that now, with an unprecedented demand for tonnage of all descriptions, vessels flying the American flag, no matter how many may be obtained within the present year, could be obtained at rates below those being paid for British, Norwegian, or Dutch freighters? I will state at once that I believe it to be ridiculous to suppose that any possible contingency could bring about this result within a period when help will be most needed. To approach the subject with the assumption that a greatly increased American merchant marine is to be operated, either directly by the Government or under its immediate control as regards the fixing of freight rates, it is at once obvious that some very important issues will require consideration.
> First. Where are the vessels to be obtained? If they are to be purchased from neutral countries and operated at rates below the market, those remaining under foreign flags will obtain still higher rates. If they are to be built, at least a year will be required to enable all existing American shipyards to turn out 50 freighters of 7,000 tons capacity. If they are to be purchased from German owners, from among those now interned in our ports, not to exceed 25 per cent of such interned vessels will be found available for general freight service, and what is a great deal more vital, diplomatic questions of the greatest import will surely arise with England and France.

In this connection I want to call the attention of the Senate to what I am satisfied is a widespread misapprehension in regard to these German ships interned in our ports. Some people seem to have the idea that they can all be used to any part of the world, that the Government can buy them and use them. To begin with, there is the Vaderland, with one exception the largest boat ever built in the whole history of shipbuilding. She could not be kept in service except with an enormously large passenger traffic. She carries, crew and all, 5,000 people. Fancy buying that boat to send down to Rio de Janeiro, where the last boat that came in had 26 passengers. The whole list of those interned in our ports, as has been recently given—I will either read it or have it printed in the RECORD—is largely made up of boats that are suitable only for passenger service, and an expensive passenger service as well, where there is a large percentage of persons asking for expensive accommodations:

> Second. If obtained, where are the vessels to be operated? Are they to be placed in trades where the extraordinary demand has forced rates from one-fourth of a cent per pound on cotton to 3 cents per pound?
> I can fill this page with the names of ordinary cargo vessels now operated on the trans-Atlantic which are earning for their owners from a fourth to a half of the vessel's value in one voyage from the United States to Europe. Is it probable that owners having available tonnage will now be willing to dispose of these vessels at reasonable prices? In spite of the lack of men in shipyards and the extraordinary rush now on in England for warship construction, vessel operators in Great Britain in one week recently placed orders with builders on the Clyde alone for 30 large freighters. This will indicate more clearly than any argument how great is the demand for tonnage and how difficult it will be to obtain it for prompt service under any circumstances whatsoever.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a question?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Going back to the item of which the Senator was previously speaking, I ask him if we have any information which is accessible as to the amount of tonnage that might be available to purchase or charter under this bill if it becomes a law, or have we a statement as to the number and tonnage of the ships of belligerents now interned in our ports?

Mr. BURTON. I will offer such a list before I conclude my remarks this evening.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think it would be very illuminating.

Mr. BURTON. I think less attention, perhaps, has been paid to this list because it has been taken for granted that boats would be seized if they engaged in the trade, whether they were in Government ownership or owned by private parties.

As to other boats, I suppose this very line about which I am reading could perhaps be purchased.

> Or is it proposed that vessels to be obtained are to be operated in trades where the demand is not so great; let us say, for example, in the trade to South America? Operators of tonnage to South America can readily prove to the satisfaction of your honorable committee that the rates now ruling on freight to all South America are barely sufficient to remunerate them in the operation in those trades of 7,000-ton vessels, for whose charter they have been paying, say, $8,000 per month. These same vessels can not now be obtained for twice that amount, and their purchase price has risen proportionately. Will the Government obtain vessels at such rates and then still further reduce rates to South America, in competition with existing companies trading to that part of the world? The same condition exists in routes to Africa, Australia, and the Orient.

Mr. President, all the persons who are operating ships at this time are not of the type to which reference is sometimes made as "bloated capitalists." A considerable number of those who have engaged in the shipping trade—and with a purpose which at this time is little less than patriotic—to carry American products to foreign lands and to increase our export trade have leased ships at the very top notch of the rates in the market, and have leased them for a considerable time. Those who have taken out such charters on boats are compelled, at least for the time, to realize these high freight rates or else they will go bankrupt.

In the first place, I think that that should disarm anyone from hastily criticizing the rates charged, and, in the next place, what is the Government going to do about it? Is it going to go into this business and so manage rates that it will ruin these men? Is that the fair function of this Government? If so, we are hearing something new under the sun.

If the Government goes into this business because prices are high, if the Congress and Government officials shut their eyes to facts that are as plain as day, which have caused this demoralized condition and the large increase in rates, is that going to be a precedent whenever anyone takes it into his head that prices are getting too high—for the Government to go into other lines of business, of manufacture or merchandising or the raising of some particular farm product?

Every measure that is before this honorable body is not only very important in itself, but it is important for the precedent that it creates; and I do not wish to leave this line of inquiry without asking my Democratic colleagues to beware the example they will set if they pass this bill, which is contrary to every principle laid down by the great leaders of the Democratic Party in the past; contrary to the idea that that government governs best which governs least; contrary to the idea that a bureaucracy—as it is called in an article by the present President of France, a parasitical bureaucracy—is a bad thing for a government; contrary to the idea that has been universally maintained, that it is better to maintain the individuality, the initiative of each individual in the body politic, in order to build up a nation which shall be great and strong—great and strong because its individual units are independent and ready to meet any situation which may arise.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. What the Senator from Ohio has suggested leads me to propound to him an inquiry. This bill proposes the organization of a private corporation. The only influence that the Government can exert over the corporation is in the election of directors, I assume. When those directors are elected and are thus put in charge of the corporation they in turn select officers who are to operate the business of the corporation. When that corporation comes to fix rates, concerning which the Senator from Ohio has just been speaking, how would the Government control such rates except through the indirect influence which the knowledge that they might be turned out at the end of a year might work upon them? In other words, this corporation fixes the rates, but the Government does not fix the rates. We, as a Government, have no more authority over the corporation than we would have if the corporation had been organized entirely with private capital.

I should like to have the Senator's view with regard to either the propriety or the power of entrusting to a corporation of that kind, organized in that way, the authority to regulate the commerce in which the corporation may be engaged by fixing rates of transportation.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, it would seem to me altogether inefficient and disastrous. As the Senator from Iowa has stated, the only influence that the Government would have over the directors would be indirect. They would feel that they owed their election to the shipping board of three members, but, even when you reach the authority of these three men, of course they are not the Government—they are the agents of it. Their action is not determined by the ordinary processes of law, by the passage of legislation. The first attempts to fix rates were by direct legislation. Later, the conclusion was reached that the subject involved so much detail that the authority could better be vested in a board or commission.

At present rate fixing is very largely in the hands of commissions, in the various States as well as under Federal authority; their powers are, however, definitely limited by legal enactment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. What the Senator from Ohio has just said is entirely true, but the commission to which we intrust the power exercises a quasi legislative authority and performs a legislative act in determining what the rates shall be, although it has some of the aspects of a judicial function as well. The difficulty with the bill now under discussion is that you do not give to the shipping board any authority to fix rates. We can not, as the representatives of a stockholder in a corporation of this sort, give to the shipping board any authority to fix rates. If we confer upon anybody the power to fix rates for the Government we will be compelled to confer it upon this corporation, and we will then be met with the astonishing situation in which the Government of the United States attempts to give to a private corporation the authority to fix rates in order to regulate commerce with foreign nations. I do not understand that we have either the constitutional authority to confer that power or that it would be wise to confer it if we had such authority.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly, Mr. President, to say the least, it is exceedingly incongruous.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. COLT. The Senator from Ohio is dealing with the subject in a most exhaustive way, and it may be that he has dwelt upon the particular inquiry I have in mind, namely, what would be the status of these ships? Would they be Government-owned ships or private-owned ships? Suppose that the title to these ships were conveyed to a corporation in which the Government owns a majority of the stock, or it may be the whole of the stock, would that fact from the standpoint of international law change the status of the vessel from a Government-owned vessel to a private-owned vessel? I do not know whether the Senator has dwelt upon this point.

Mr. BURTON. There has been some little discussion of that subject. But first answering the Senator from Iowa——

Mr. COLT. I was going to say that, from the international standpoint, I think it is a very important inquiry, whether, looking at these ships from the standpoint of their real ownership and brushing aside the fiction of a corporation, and especially if they carried mail, they would not be considered Government-owned ships. It is apparent that this is a governmental scheme of ownership; it starts with an appropriation of millions of dollars by the Government for the purpose of establishing a merchant marine to be controlled by the Government. How then can we escape the conclusion, from the standpoint of international law, and especially if the vessels carry mails, that they will be regarded as Government-owned vessels and therefore subject to the international rules of law which apply to Government ships and Government property as distinguished from private ships and private property?

Mr. BURTON. I will come to that in a few moments.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. Just a moment. I should like first to conclude the branch of the subject which I was discussing. In the situation suggested by the Senator from Iowa, how you are going to elect directors in this most extraordinary corporation I do not understand. I think practically every State in the Union has a provision requiring directors in corporations to be stockholders. It goes without saying that a director must be an individual; that is, a person.

Mr. NELSON. In that connnection I want to ask the Senator a question, and suggest to him that there is, so far as I know, no Federal law under which this proposed corporation can be created.

Mr. BURTON. No.

Mr. NELSON. The only Federal laws we have in relation to Federal incorporations are those affecting national banks. There have been some special incorporation acts relating to the Pacific Railroad, but those acts are, as it were, functus officio, because they covered special cases and have long since served their purpose. Outside of that there are no Federal incorporation laws at all. Under this bill this corporation can be formed under the laws of some State or the District of Columbia, and we do not know, until we find out where the corporation is incorporated, what are the rules and regulations that will govern it. If it is incorporated under a State law, manifestly the State law will control the operations of the corporation. Then we have this situation, and that is the question I am coming to: We have a State law and State regulations that will regulate the operations of a corporation in which the United States Government owns the major part of the stock. Will not that lead to endless conflict between State authority and Federal authority?

Mr. BURTON. When the Government goes into the business of incorporating some of its functions and forms a corporation in a State, the State will have the control of that corporation and can make rules for its government. There is no doubt of that. It can impose on it such regulations as it sees fit.

To continue my remarks concerning the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me one more question in that connection?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Would the Federal Government as a stockholder in such a corporation, organized and created under the laws of a State, have any greater right than any other stockholder because of the fact that it was the Federal Government instead of a private individual that was a subscriber to the stock?

Mr. BURTON. I think not, because privileges and duties are incident to stock ownership, and you can not create different classes of stockholders.

It would be necessary to have some one go outside of the 51 per cent of stock owned by the Government and buy a part of the 49 per cent of stock remaining in order to qualify as a director. The three members of the shipping board would vote the 51 per cent, and they would have an overwhelming preponderance, perhaps, in the voting; but that does not make them or anybody else eligible as director. To be eligible they would have to buy a part of the remaining 49 per cent of the stock to be taken by private subscription. Just consider the absurdity of the proposition in the first instance. You own 51 per cent of the stock, and yet you have to acquire part of the remaining 49 per cent in order to be able to qualify as a director.

The probability is that they would buy just a few shares each. Suppose the unexpected should happen, and private stockholders should buy the balance of the 49 per cent. Of course they would have representation on the board. It would not be fair for the Government of the United States to follow the reprehensible example set by some wicked corporations—making use of the ownership of a bare majority of stock to elect the whole board of directors. They would have to give the other stockholders representation. Suppose there were four directors in the interest of the Government and three in the interest of the minority stockholders. According to the regulations of some of the States, they would have to permit minority representation on the board of directors.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota in just a moment. Just see what a situation would develop. There would be four men, perhaps, under the domination of the shipping board and three men looking out for themselves, one group desiring low rates, the other desiring high rates. If the history of corporate management is to be repeated, it is very likely that those three would draw one of the other four over to their side, and they might raise the rates beyond reason, or do anything which was in the interest, not of the Government, and not of the people, but of those who owned the 49 per cent. The whole thing, Mr. President, is so unnatural that, to me, it is almost inconceivable.

The point made by the Senator from Minnesota eliminates the plan of Federal corporation from consideration. The only general Federal laws that we have dealing with incorporation are the statutes under which national banks may be established. So far as I recall, there are no others. There have been repeated instances where persons have appealed to Congress for a private act of incorporation, and we would have to pass such an act or else incorporate under the laws of one of the States or of the District of Columbia.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information. Assuming that the Government invested this $40,000,000 in shipping, what proportion would the Government's tonnage be of the aggregate tonnage afloat in the international trade, eliminating from that the German tonnage that has been withdrawn and the tonnage withdrawn by the other belligerents on account of the war? Take the tonnage as it is to-day. What percentage of the total tonnage that is afloat to-day would this tonnage purchased with $40,000,000 be?

Mr. BURTON. I do not know that I can say in exact figures. But a rough estimate of the value of the mercantile marine of the United States is $560,000,000, and $40,000,000 would be one-fourteenth of that amount. That shows what a trivial amount of tonnage could be acquired for $40,000,000. The Senator from Minnesota, though, understands that there is absolutely no limit to the amount of stock subscription under this bill.

Mr. NELSON. No; but assuming that, I am following it up with another question that is perfectly germane. Assuming that they do not exceed the $40,000,000 investment in new shipping, the proportion of that shipping to the world's shipping that is now in active use would be scarcely 1 per cent, would it?

Mr. BURTON. I should say it would be rather more than that.

Mr. NELSON. Would it exceed 3 per cent?

Mr. BURTON. I can not say exactly, though I should say not.

Mr. NELSON. Then I will follow that up with another question; and in order to show what I mean I will read from the report of the majority of the committee on this bill:

> This legislation, so far as it permits the control of ocean freight rates by transportation in vessels under Government direction, is in line with all recent rate legislation. It permits that to be done at sea which we have long done at home, and provides for the ocean carrier what we long ago provided for the common carrier on land.

Can the Senator conceive how the limited amount of shipping that we can acquire under this bill, assuming that $40,000,000 is the amount, can control the ocean rates among the multitude of existing foreign vessels?

Mr. BURTON. I spoke of that yesterday, and I then stated that the Government-owned vessels would be used for favored products or favored localities, and that the general public would not be benefited by their operation. It would naturally be expected that this shipping corporation would reduce rates to a very low figure to carry cotton or wheat or some other product. Could not the shippers of meat and of oil and of iron and of steel complain, "We are not having a square deal in this matter"? Suppose these boats were sent out from Boston alone, or from Galveston. Might not every other seaboard city say, "You have, at the cost of the people of the United States, acquired certain steamships; we are getting no benefit from them; they go exclusively from one or two ports"?

Where would any advantage accrue to the public if these vessels were run at a loss? They would not reduce the rates on the rest of the traffic. The only persons who would benefit would be those so fortunate as to live in the cities from which the boats would sail or who were so fortunate as to own the products which the boats would carry. The situation would be similar to that which existed 30 or 40 years ago, during the railroad wars. A railroad paralleling another and competing with its would reduce rates on some commodity or lower all rates for a certain time. A few persons, usually the big shippers, would ship their products at such times. Before long the rates would be restored to normal again. Who secured this profit? Not the consumer of the product that was shipped, but the owner of that product—the packer, or whoever it might be—who gained the benefit of a sporadic, exceptional rate. Exactly the same condition would arise under this shipping plan with the conditions as suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, in which only a small part of the traffic is carried by Government ships, and that probably only occasionally.

Just as the shipment by railroads at the time of these rate wars constituted only a comparatively small share of the traffic and the benefit was secured by the few favored shippers, so under this plan of a Government-owned line the favored few and not the people at large would get the benefit of the low rates.

The question presented by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] is one to which some little attention was given the first day this bill was discussed. That is, suppose the Government of the United States as a part of its policy with reference to shipping decides to become a stockholder in a corporation and passes a law authorizing its representatives to take the majority of stock in that corporation in the first instance and to subscribe for the balance if it is not taken by private parties.

Suppose, further, it provides that the bonds of the Government, which are restricted to purely governmental purposes, may be issued to the amount of $30,000,000 and ships purchased for that amount and those ships turned over to this corporation under certain restrictions, such as that the boats shall not be sold except by the direction of Congress, and that they shall not be leased except under the direction of the shipping board, and giving certain rights to the shipping board and to the President. You have, on the one hand, a corporation owning the ships just like any of our steamship lines. You have a corporation with all the rules pertaining to that corporation. It must be organized within a State and must conform to the laws of that State. On the other side it appears that this is but a form, that it is a method which the Government adopts to carry out a certain purpose, namely, the buying and operation of ships which it is supposed are to be purchased and operated for a public purpose. While it is not exactly clear, I think we may say that an emergency is given as the reason for this proposal.

The situation presents some confusion; but I should incline to the opinion that these boats, so far as detention on the sea is concerned, would have a dual capacity. If they are carrying private goods, if they are engaged in the same business as private ships, they can be overhauled just like any private ships. They would have no more rights under international law than any other ships. But if they are engaged in carrying mail or a purely governmental purpose—and it has been held that the incidental carrying of a certain amount of passengers and of freight does not take away that quality if the main purpose is that of a mail vessel—then they would have all the immunities of a Government vessel. But does that put them on a different footing from any private ship?

Mr. COLT. I should like to ask the Senator, if the 49 per cent of the stock is not subscribed by private individuals, and the Government actually owns all the stock, will not these ships be in fact Government-owned ships under international law?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Rhode Island, who is a most excellent and experienced lawyer, can answer that question quite as well as I. Is there a difference between the two cases—in one the Government subscribing only 51 per cent, and in the other the full 100 per cent? Is the infusion of a certain amount of private ownership going to alter the situation? Is not the real question whether there is a difference between this form of ownership by a corporation and ownership by the Government directly?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is possible the Senator from Ohio, in answering the inquiry of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] has overlooked one of the provisions of the bill itself. The question in so far as it can be disposed of through a congressional declaration is disposed of in the bill.

Mr. BURTON. That is the Stone amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is in the substitute which is now pending. The bill specifically declares that all these ships, no matter whether the Government owns a majority of the stock or all the stock, shall have the status of privately owned ships, shall be entitled to no greater rights in charter or on the sea than though they were owned by a private corporation. I think you will find that direct information in the bill.

Mr. BURTON. That is an amendment proposed, I believe, by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], which aims to give to these boats the same status as privately owned ships. In some relations of these boats that would be conclusive, but in others it would not. You give them a certain status by the mere fact that they are owned by the corporation whose creation was instituted by the Government. It seems to me that no declaration of this kind can do away with that fact. You might as well paint a mule and write below "This is a horse." You can not make these boats the same as privately owned boats by any mere legislative declaration. In the treatment that they would receive in the prize courts, possibly in the irritation that would be caused if one of them violated the law, in the danger of a diplomatic rupture and quarrel between nations there are certain features which pertain to these boats which could not possibly pertain to privately owned ships.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want the Senator from Ohio to understand that it is my opinion that the mere declaration in the bill can change the fact. I take it that the declaration would be effective whenever we sought against any foreign nation to assert any claim on account of one of these ships, but if a foreign nation should complain to us of the action or conduct of any of the ships we could not shield ourselves behind the declaration that we make in the bill, that they are to be regarded as privately owned ships. So in making that declaration we are limiting ourselves in some rights that we might otherwise claim, but we are not protecting ourselves against any right which a foreign Government might assert against us.

I did not want the Senator from Ohio to feel that in suggesting the presence of that declaration in the bill I was of the opinion that it would change the fact if the conduct of any one of these ships ever came in question between ourselves and a foreign Government.

Mr. BURTON. Suppose, for instance, contraband should be found on one of these boats, could the Government of the United States be in quite the same position as in the case of an absolutely private-owned boat, and could it say, "Oh, we passed a statute that these should be regarded as private vessels—that is, a private ship—and the Government of the United States is in no way responsible for it?" I do not think we could make that claim valid.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will suggest that section 5 of the bill contains the provision the Senator from Iowa has suggested. Section 5 covers the point that they may be entitled to American registry and have the same rights as vessels of the United States.

Mr. BURTON. The difficulty about that, Mr. President, as I have already stated, is that by no legislative declaration can you change the essential nature of this transaction. You can not ignore the legislation creating this corporation and providing that the Government of the United States should use its credit and its character for ships that are to be turned over to a corporation of this kind. I see in section 5 the provision that they "shall be entitled to registry under the laws of the United States and shall be deemed vessels of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels, except such vessels shall engage only in trade with foreign countries or with the Philippine Islands, the Hawaiian Islands, and the islands of Guam and Tutuila."

I wish now to continue reading from the article by Mr. Slechta.

Assuming that it is intended to operate vessels in the trades last mentioned, who, the public asks, is to make up the deficit? If they are to be operated on routes to Europe, what will become of this tonnage when the demand now existing in those trades has fallen away, as it surely will? Granted, for the sake of argument, that the demand will continue as great for two years. By that time England, Norway, and Holland will have put on enough new tonnage to reduce the owners' earnings to a reasonable figure. And when an English owner's earnings are reasonable, there is no earning at all for an owner operating American tonnage under existing conditions in our laws and regulations.

I am convinced that not only the public but your honorable committee and other Members of Congress are not familiar with the causes which have brought about the present abnormal conditions in shipping. Red Cross and other relief organizations have alone taken enough tonnage out of the market to have an appreciable effect upon the steadily advancing rates for steamer hires. Shall we desist from such philanthropy in order to give more space to carry munitions of war and other supplies to belligerents? The British and French Governments have leased for a long period of time hundreds of the finest vessels afloat, using them for naval and army purposes. To cite some illustrations of how the thing has worked out: The Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co. of Great Britain are owners of 60 large vessels, averaging about 8,500 tons gross capacity. Among this number are a good many fine liners normally employed in the Far East routes. Of the total number nearly 50 per cent, including all of the best vessels, have been leased by the British Government. The Ellerman-Bucknell Lines own and operate a total of about 125 vessels, averaging about 5,000 tons capacity. Their best vessels have nearly all been taken by the British Government, and the same is true of the 85 vessels owned by the Elder Dempster Line. Ocean traffic from England to Africa and the Far East has in no respect fallen off since the war began. What has been the result? The three lines mentioned, as well as scores of other lines of less importance, have had to replace the vessels taken by the Government with freighters either owned by them and normally leased out to others, or to charter similar vessels which they do not own and which are normally employed on trade routes to and from American ports. It is not at all a question of flag with those companies. They have, as a matter of fact, preferred Dutch and Scandinavian vessels to British, thus serving to increase still further the demand for neutral tonnage so much desired in our own trades. To a lesser extent this experience has been identical with that of the Cunard Line, White Star Line, French Line, Holland-American Line, and the several Italian lines.

Tonnage can not be created out of thin air. At present it is simply not available. We are ourselves suffering directly as a result of this condition. The writer has no motive other than to get at the facts in the matter. If there can be conceived any project by which the situation can be relieved, then I am for it; but it is impossible to believe that any measure yet presented to Congress on this question will serve the desired end. In one way, and one way only, can an American merchant marine be operated on a large scale advantageously. Abolish all existing laws on navigation. Let owners buy their vessels in the open markets of the world. There are vessels for sale on the stocks of United Kingdom shipbuilders at this moment. The prices are high now, but still lower than that for which American builders can or will build them. Let owners hire their officers and men in the open labor markets of the world. Then, and then only, will we have a merchant marine which can be operated without placing an additional and foolish tax burden on the American people.

In reading these various communications I desire to say that I do not necessarily approve of all the sentiments of their authors. I have presented three documents here. The address of M. Pezet, the Peruvian minister, which contains an excellent discussion of the feeling in South America toward us, the differences in tradition and race and political history which stand in the way of a more perfect understanding. I have presented also this article on Latin-American trade prepared by the commission appointed by Secretary Redfield and, I suppose, in a measure under his direction. I regard that, as I have already said, as the most valuable contribution to the subject of trade in general, and particularly South American trade. Now I have quoted from this communication of Mr. Slechta, who has an exceptional familiarity with South American trade and expresses his opinion on all subjects related to the shipping business:

I can not close this communication without taking some decided exceptions to the conclusions reached in the report on this subject from the Department of Commerce to the Senate. Mr. Redfield objects to the operation of foreign tonnage in such a way as to net their owners the largest possible profits. Permit me to say that this is childishness in the extreme. Does Mr. Redfield propose to have the American Government control the 3,000 tramp steamers flying the British flag in such a way that only the interests of American exporters will be served, regardless of the owners' rights? That is what he says, in effect. This report betrays a woeful ignorance as to the causes and effects in the movement of international commerce. Has Mr. Redfield considered the fact that the high rates which now rule on shipments of wheat and other food products, for example, are decidedly an advantage to the majority of the American people? Were freight rates on wheat for export normal to-day, the exports of our wheat would so greatly exceed the amount available for export—that is, our surplus production—that there would be a shortage for our own people, and the whole population would pay extravagant prices for flour—higher even than they are paying to-day—for the privilege of enriching the comparatively few who produce wheat, and more especially the speculators in New York, Chicago, and Minneapolis who buy wheat for export.

Mr. President, I would like to obtain a diagram of the different views of this administration on this proposition of cost. It is impossible for anyone to show any consistency in the views of this administration about prices and rates. In the campaign of 1912 no promise was more frequently made to the American people by the Democratic Party than that the election of the Democratic ticket would reduce prices. The chairman of the State convention in the great State of New York, afterwards governor of the State, said if Woodrow Wilson were elected President of the United States high prices would virtually disappear "on the 4th of March next." Possibly in the heat and enthusiasm of the time it was not intended that that statement should be taken seriously, but there were many who believed it, and many voted for Woodrow Wilson because they thought prices would fall with his election and inauguration.

Now, any person who has given careful attention to this subject would know that with the world-wide increase in prices neither tariff laws nor the Republican Party was responsible for that condition. The people are to-day holding the Democratic Party responsible for failing to comply with a promise which they made in that campaign. The cost of living is as high now as it ever was, and if there is a falling off anywhere it is accompanied with a diminished prosperity. If the cost of an article in which labor enters largely is less, it means that workingmen are out of employment.

It was said that prices would be lower if Woodrow Wilson were elected. They are not lower; if anything, they are higher. But now comes the President and complains that the farmer is not getting prices high enough. What does this mean? How under the sun is the farmer going to get high prices for his produce without somebody being compelled to pay higher prices?

It is only my friends on the other side, the party in opposition, who can go around telling the people two different things, saying to the farmers, "Your pork and your meat and your wheat should be as high as ever," and then the next day go into the cities saying to the denizens there, to workingmen and others, "You are suffering from the pinch of the high cost of living, and we will relieve you; prices will be lower." I say that kind of a campaign, which offers happiness, joy, and hope to all, can only be carried on by a party that is in the opposition. I really think the promise was pretty effective in the last campaign and that a great many unthinking people believed it. Now, how are we to understand all this? Purchase ships, spend $40,000,000, and operate them at a loss because the farmer is not getting enough for his produce. My sympathies have been with the farmer; he is entitled to come into his own; but wheat is selling at over $1.40 a bushel in the Chicago market, a higher price than at any time for nearly 50 years—to be exact, 48 years; in 1866, I think, wheat sold for a little more. On the same day and in the same paper which chronicles the account of the necessity for buying ships, so that the farmer may get good prices, we read that the representative of a great consumers' union called on the President and asked him to put an absolute embargo on the shipment of wheat.

Well, now, will you not draw some diagram, will you not make some explanation, so as to make clear to an inquiring mind how you are reconciling all these things? I trust that will be done in the course of this debate.

I should be glad, though I fear it is hardly probable, if you would go back and read some of those old 1912 campaign speeches on lower prices, and then take up the price list which prevails to-day; and show us, if you can, that the workingman, the man on a salary, or any of our citizens have gained anything in the way of relief from the high cost of living by this Democratic administration. But perhaps, for the present, it is enough if it be explained to us why there is talk of an embargo on farm products, to absolutely prevent their being shipped out of the country, because prices are getting to be so high, and at the same time we are told by the President himself that we must buy ships in order to get the farmers' products to market more readily, and thus increase demand and still further raise prices.

Mr. President, that idea will not bear analysis at all. There never was a time in the history of prices when it was clearer that the consumer paid the freight than it is that he does so right now. That is always the case when there is a deficient supply and sources that have usually furnished the market are cut off. If there were now several competing sources of supply, such as Russia, India, Roumania, Turkey, all the countries that furnish wheat, and if each had a normal supply, if the lines of trade were open and the freight rates were raised on wheat carried from the United States to Europe and not raised on the other lines, there would be some need of additional shipping. But in every case the freight rate is added to the cost in this country. Those people over there need wheat; otherwise why do they import it? Why have they imported it in such great quantities? The price depends upon the demand the world over. When a certain price is fixed, the freight in addition to that price is paid by the buyer, and the farmer of the United States gets his full price. The freight rate on wheat is 1½ pence, or 3 cents, which would be very low. The farmer sells his wheat here at a normal price, and the consumer on the other side must pay 3 cents additional. If the freight rate is 10 pence, or 20 cents, the consumer likewise pays it on the other side. So there is nothing in that contention to show that we must have a line of ships owned and controlled by the Government in order to help out the farmer in this emergency.

I do not believe the farmer is asking for this line. I find it difficult to find any man who understands the situation who is asking for this line outside of those who have seemed to adopt it as a political policy.

Before I am through I wish to have read a communication from the Board of Trade of New Orleans setting forth their views on this measure. If there is any one city in this broad Union which has complained of high freight rates, if there is any locality where you would think they would need such a bill as this, it is that city at the mouth of the Mississippi, where cotton is shipped on so large a scale. But they condemn this proposed legislation in unqualified terms. Mr. President, perhaps while I am on this subject—I have strayed somewhat from the line of argument which I had pursued—I would ask to have the paper read right now. As I have not before asked to have any document read, I should like to have this read from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the New Orleans Board of Trade (Ltd.), protesting against the proposed legislation providing for Government ownership and operation of merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, December 29, 1914.

Whereas a bill known as H. R. 18666, providing for the Government ownership and operation of merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, now pending in Congress, was considered at a meeting of the executive committee of the New Orleans Board of Trade under date of September 17, 1914, and an informal resolution was adopted protesting against the passage of such bill, which resolution was formally approved by the board of directors of the Board of Trade under date of October 14, 1914; and

Whereas no formal resolution was adopted by the board at that time because of the belief that the bill was so unwise that it would not be pressed, it is now considered advisable, in view of the present activity of President Wilson, to bring about the passage of said bill, that the New Orleans Board of Trade do now go on record with the following formal resolutions; and

Whereas by the provisions of said bill a shipping board, composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce, may subscribe to the capital stock of any corporation now or hereafter organized under the laws of the United States or any State thereof or the District of Columbia for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating merchant vessels in the trade between the United States and foreign countries under certain prescribed conditions; and

Whereas said proposed legislation has met with the almost universal condemnation of the press as being unwise, unnecessary, unprofitable, and a dangerous undertaking for our Government: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the New Orleans Board of Trade (Ltd.) voice its emphatic protest against legislation of any such character, and submit for the consideration of its Senators and Representatives in Congress the following points:

1. It would be a startling and dangerous step toward socialism; and if the Government succeeded in starting on a small scale, it is difficult to foretell to what extent this dangerous precedent might lead.

2. There is no necessity for it, as there is quite a sufficient number of vessels in operation at the present time to take care of our commerce to Central and South American countries; and while there is probably, a temporary scarcity of tonnage to Europe, this will be relieved as soon as the war is over.

3. The passage of such legislation would be entirely inadequate and inefficient to create an American merchant marine, as, if the Government were to subscribe the full amount of the capital stock of $10,000,000 to a single corporation and then issue $30,000,000 in bonds, it would not add more than 40 or 50 ships to our merchant marine.

4. The enactment of such legislation would be a serious blow to our American merchant marine, in that it would destroy the initiative on the part of private capital, and no one would think of attempting to build, buy, or operate merchant vessels in competition with the United States Government, and the privately owned vessels which are now under the American flag would, in our judgment, diminish to such an extent as to actually reduce the aggregate tonnage of the American merchant marine rather than increase it.

5. Such legislation, it would appear to us, would be dangerous, on account of the possibility of international complications, because of the present war in Europe, in that any vessels purchased by the United States Government from German, English, French, Russian, or Japanese interests would be looked upon with suspicion by the opposing belligerent forces, and more than likely cause serious complications to arise.

6. It would, further, cause international complications in the matter of the shipment of supplies, as if any contraband of war were found on board any Government-owned vessels, or those of any corporation in which the Government had stock ownership, the belligerent nations would have a perfect right to consider it an unfriendly act on the part of the United States Government, and probably involve the Government in war. This would not be true of private interests, as if a vessel owned by a private corporation, but sailing under the American flag, or any other flag, should be found with contraband of war on board, the vessel or cargo, as the case might be, would be subject to seizure or taken as a prize, and the controversy would be between the belligerent nation and the shipowner, and not the United States Government.

7. We do not believe it would be a business proposition for the Government to engage in the steamship business, as, in our judgment, it would prove an expensive failure, and we seriously doubt if, after the Government had taken 51 per cent of the capital stock of any corporation organized for the purpose of taking advantage of this bill, individuals would take the other 49 per cent. It is a well-known fact that the operation of the Panama Railroad steamers from New York has proven an expensive undertaking for the Government, notwithstanding they were in a better position to provide these ships with tonnage and passengers than any private corporation.

8. In conclusion, we consider it ill-advised legislation, and believe that the proposed bill should be withdrawn from the calendar of Congress, and that the attention of the Merchant Marine Committee be more directed to such revision of our obsolete navigation laws as will bring them in line with the laws of Great Britain, France, and Germany, which, when done, will, we believe, relieve the situation and restore the American merchant marine to the seas through the means of private capital: Be it, therefore, further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions and arguments be sent to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Merchant Marine Committee in the House, and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress from Louisiana, and the United States Chamber of Commerce.

NEW ORLEANS BOARD OF TRADE (LTD.),

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. BURTON. No; I have not concluded.

Mr. STONE. Just a moment, Mr. President. The Senator took his seat.

Mr. BURTON. Only while a document which I sent up to the desk was being read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that the Senator from Ohio yielded the floor.

Mr. STONE. I think a Senator surrenders the floor when he takes his seat. The nineteenth rule provides that a Senator who desires to speak shall rise and address the Presiding Officer.

Mr. GALLINGER. Which the Senator from Ohio did. The Senator perhaps remembers that Senators——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have the floor at this moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will not yield?

Mr. STONE. No; I will not yield until I have finished.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, what do I understand this proceeding is?

Mr. STONE. I make the point of order that I am entitled to the floor myself in my own right. I rose and addressed the Chair.

Mr. BURTON. I do not so understand. I do not wish to yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. I make the point that the Senator did yield the floor, and I wish to read——

Mr. BURTON. Do I understand the Chair to make a definite ruling that I have not the floor?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I call for the regular order.

Mr. STONE. I am making a point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. A point of order is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, in addition to the rule I have quoted, I read from Jefferson's Manual, page 92, which is the law governing this body.

Mr. GALLINGER. Part of it.

Mr. STONE. I read as follows:

When any Member means to speak he is to stand up in his place, uncovered, and to address himself, not to the House, or any particular Member, but to the Speaker, who calls him by his name, that the House may take notice who it is that speaks. But Members who are indisposed may be indulged to speak sitting.

Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio is sick, I am entirely willing that he should sit down to address the body.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I feel that the Senator from Missouri ought to be assured that I am not sick or indisposed, either one.

Mr. STONE. Very well; then, I am willing to yield the floor to the Senator now, but I shall insist upon his observing the rules of the Senate and of parliamentary law as laid down by the authority which has been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, this document seemed to be of unusual importance, and I desired to have it read at the desk. It took some five minutes. I was not averse to reading it myself, but I desired the additional impressiveness that it would have by being read in that way, and during that time perhaps I did sit down. However, the absurdity of saying that when a Member of this body is addressing the Senate and some document is being read he must in the meantime stand on his feet is too great to require any discussion here. The fact of the matter is, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] suggests, I do not think I took my seat except in a very qualified way. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I now desire to read the protest of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange against the proposed shipping legislation:

[Protest against the passage of bill H. R. 18666, providing for Government ownership and operation of merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States.]

THE PHILADELPHIA MARITIME EXCHANGE,
Philadelphia, December 31, 1914.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

This memorial of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange respectfully represents:

First. That a bill (H. R. 18666) providing for Government ownership and operation of merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States is pending in the Congress of the United States.

Second. That by the provisions of the bill a shipping board, composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce, may subscribe to the capital stock of any corporation now or hereafter organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State thereof, or of the District of Columbia, for the purpose of purchasing, constructing, maintaining, and operating merchant vessels in the trade between the Atlantic, Gulf, or Pacific ports of the United States and the ports of Central and South America and elsewhere, to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States.

Third. That question is raised as to whether this proposed legislative action by the Government of the United States is justifiable and technically right, while the real question at issue is whether in the present emergency it is either necessary or advisable.

Fourth. That the advocates of the measure advance the theory that shipping facilities for the transportation of our exports abroad under existing conditions are inadequate, but appear not to accept the testimony of experienced and practical men that the present situation is due mainly, not to any extensive lack of vessels but to the present unstable foreign exchange operations, scarcity of foreign labor for handling commerce, and particularly to the high cost of marine insurance, and that with relief in these directions greater activity will follow and the present and future requirements of commerce amply met by private enterprise.

Fifth. That from an investment standpoint it could not be expected to appeal to the public. Although the men selected for the posts of Secretary of the Treasury, Postmaster General, and Secretary of Commerce are of the highest mental and moral attainments, it is not probable that they would be chosen especially because they were experienced in the ownership and operation of merchant vessels, to be successful in which requires long years of training and an intimate knowledge of every detail of the business.

Sixth. That under our system of government the personnel of these offices, with rare exception, changes every four years. It is not likely, therefore, that with such a flexible and uncertain management the public could even be tempted to invest its capital in an enterprise in the control of which it can for all time hold only a minority representation.

Seventh. That if this conclusion be well founded the proposed legislation would place the Government in direct and complete competition with a large number of our citizens who, with investments of many millions of dollars, are engaged in a business essentially private in character and readily controllable both by competition and governmental regulation.

No private enterprise, however capably and economically administered, where the management is accountable to its stockholders, can compete with the Government in the same industry, where there is no such accountability.

Eighth. That under the terms of legislation recently enacted by Congress providing for the transfer of foreign-built vessels to American registry, with necessary revision of our navigation laws to enable us to compete on equal terms with foreign shipping, instant impetus and a steady, wholesome growth should be given to our merchant marine, which, however, could not survive against Government competition.

The effect of this legislation should be fully demonstrated before any other is undertaken.

Ninth. That in dealing with this important subject the neutrality obligations of the United States should be seriously considered and any ground for criticism or even suspicion of our good faith avoided.

Tenth. That the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, strongly advocating the upbuilding of the merchant marine of the United States, regards the provisions of bill H. R. 18666 as dangerous in the extreme, and is of the opinion that the ownership and operation by the Government of merchant vessels is a backward rather than a forward step, and will not only discourage but destroy all private initiative in the direction so earnestly desired.

Eleventh. For these reasons the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange urgently protests against the proposed measure being enacted into law.

THE PHILADELPHIA MARITIME EXCHANGE,
[SEAL.] By J. S. W. HOLTON, President.
Attest:

E. R. HARWOOD, Secretary.

I place these two protests in the RECORD—one by a board of trade in a Southern State, perhaps the leading organization of that type in the South, and the other by the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, very prominent in its association with shipping in the Northern States. I will state, also, that the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce has protested against this bill; that the New York Chamber of Commerce, an institution founded before the Revolution, and the Boston Chamber of Commerce have also protested against this bill.

In several of the sections each of these documents—the one styled "resolutions" and the other a protest—set forth in succinct form the vital objections. In the fourth division of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange protest, to repeat, it is said:

The advocates of the measure advance the theory that shipping facilities for the transportation of our exports abroad under existing conditions are inadequate, but appear not to accept the testimony of experienced and practical men that the present situation is due mainly not to any extensive lack of vessels but to present unstable foreign exchange operations, scarcity of foreign labor for handling commerce, and particularly to the high cost of marine insurance, and that with relief in these directions greater activity will follow and the present and future requirements of commerce amply met by private enterprise.

Perhaps in the course of my argument during the day I have omitted to give prominence to the very important factor of war-risk insurance. I dwelt upon the others. This, however, is so obvious and so readily goes without saying that I conjecture that everyone here knows how important it is. Why, war-risk insurance ranges away up to 8 per cent or thereabouts, and that is more than the usual profit on a ship during the whole year. It is peculiarly severe when you take into account the fact that oftentimes the capital invested by the owners of a ship or a line of ships is very much less than the actual cost of the ships, because the owner borrows a very considerable amount—bottomry bonds, or whatever you may call them—reaching sometimes as much as 66⅔ per cent of the whole amount.

I will now resume the reading of the article submitted, which was originally intended to refer only to South America, but which pertains to the shipping trade generally. This is from the article by Mr. Schlechter. Speaking of the report by the Department of Commerce, he says:

The report attempts to use as an argument in favor of an American Government owned merchant marine the circumstance of high rates now ruling and the shortage of tonnage. This is, rather, an argument against any such proposition. I can supply your honorable committee with the names of American owned and American built vessels now in the European service which are earning on each trip to Europe a fourth of the cost of their vessels. Why do these same owners not order from our shipyards more such vessels for immediate construction? There was never a time during the past hundred years when aid for an American merchant marine was less needed. If it is anticipated that the present high rates are to continue, American owners should look forward with confidence to the employment of their vessels at a profit of from 25 per cent to 100 per cent per annum. Why should they require Government aid, or why should they not proceed to build on their own initiative? The question has already been answered in the preceding pages, but to summarize, I would point out that they do not feel confident of continued high rates. If it did not cost them so much to build here, they would build on a chance of high rates holding long enough to pay them a profit. Let them buy their ships, new or old, where they please and you will have a demonstration of alacrity on the part of American owners to buy and operate American tonnage that will surprise. The explanation is that, having an opportunity to again sell their vessels at a figure at least approximating what they paid for them, they will be willing to take the chance of operating them profitably for at least a period of months. But with the certainty that when normal conditions are resumed they can neither operate at a profit nor sell without suffering a loss of from 30 per cent to 50 per cent staring them in the face, no responsible operators will assume the risk.

Again, the report errs fundamentally in stating that American producers pay the cost of the high rates on freight now ruling. Any student of high-school economics knows that it is the ultimate consumer that pays the cost and not the producer. The whole issue is not as to how we may reduce the profits of the foreign shipowner, but how may we enable actual and prospective operators of American ships to reap the same or approximate profits when profits to the foreign shipowner are high. The records show that in the 10-year period ended with 1913, owners of tramp freighters flying the British flag earned an average of only a very low interest on their investments; to be specific, not more than 4 per cent. Would American investors be content with such an investment?

Right here in this statement we may find the chief reason why an American mercantile marine has not prospered. It is regarded as a stable investment in England or Scotland when an individual or a company buys ships and operates them. They are content with 4 per cent interest. They can borrow on ships at 4 per cent interest, borrowing two-thirds of the amount. In this country, however, mortgages on ships are placed for a less percentage of the total value, the rate of interest is as much as 6 per cent, and the rate of profit with which investors are satisfied when there is an element of risk and uncertainty, as in the shipping business, is much higher than that. Consequently the American investor is not predisposed toward the building of ships. Four per cent, with the possibility of borrowing two-thirds of the value, in England 4 per cent as the profit of the investor and his dividends, as against 6 per cent that must be paid on the investment in this country, with an unwillingness to enter the venture unless the real profit is very materially higher, represents just the difference between a country in which a certain type of investment is regarded as secure and another where the investment has no established stability.

Your own committee, Judge ALEXANDER, is authority for the conclusion arrived at after your investigation of two years ago that no such thing as a general monopoly in ocean transportation exists. Yet Mr. Redfield asserts, after an investigation made in a few days by the department's agents—none of them experts even slightly familiar with shipping—that there is such a monopoly. I will not further trespass upon your time in the discussion of this report. The truth is that there is scarcely a sentence in the whole report which is not pregnant with misstatements and misconceptions of the actual facts. Conclusions are false drawn, even when they are not a priori. The whole array of statements is marshaled together to bolster up a conviction in the minds of the sponsors for the idea which was arrived at before any knowledge of the real facts was available to them.

I venture to assert that 95 per cent of the merchandise now exported from this country is shipped by those who are opposed to such an artificial interjection of Government aid in the foreign commerce question as is proposed. Exporters care little about how high the freight rates go. They are interested only in having as good a chance to get the business as the next fellow, and to have that they must have as good a rate as the shipper from other countries. If it is desired to obtain this for them, as far as is possible, then the worst way to go about it is to force them to use American ships, which can not hope to operate at a cost of less than 25 per cent more than the cost of operating British tonnage, 30 per cent more than Dutch tonnage, or 40 per cent more than Norwegian tonnage——

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. KERN. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he will yield to me to make a motion for a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock?

Mr. BURTON. As far as I am concerned, I have no objection. It does not mean that I lose my right to the floor. I do not lose my right to speak further?

Mr. KERN. Certainly not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then I ask unanimous consent that the Chair may lay before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate bill 5614, which passed the Senate unanimously and has now passed the House with slight amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to send to the desk, with the consent of the Senate, an amendment which I shall want to propose to the pending shipping bill. I ask that it may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, so that it can be seen to-morrow.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SMITH of Georgia to the bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes, viz: Amend section 1 by adding, on page 2, after the word "share," line 8:

"Provided further, That charters or leases of any vessel or vessels by such corporation, organized in pursuance of this act, in which the United States holds a majority of the stock, to any other corporation, firm, or individual shall not be made for less than 4 per cent of the value of such vessel, together with a charge of 5 per cent per annum for depreciation, and full insurance, and in no case shall such charters or lease to any one corporation, firm, or individual be of vessels in excess of $5,000,000 in value, and in no case shall such charter or lease be made to a corporation, firm, or individual with capital less than 25 per cent of the value of the vessel or vessels so chartered or leased: And provided further, That such corporation organized in pursuance of this act, in which the United States holds a majority of the capital stock, shall in no instance operate any vessel except where the same can not be chartered or leased for operation to another corporation, firm, or individual, as provided for in this section, unless such operation is necessary to move the commerce of citizens of the United States."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4012) to increase the limit of cost of the United States public building at Grand Junction, Colo., with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5295) to amend existing legislation providing for the acquisition of a site and the construction of a building thereon for the accommodation of the post office, United States courts, customhouse, and other governmental offices at Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5614) for the improvement of the foreign service, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 6309) to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park, in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 9584. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to sell the present old post office and the site thereof in the city of Jersey City, N. J.;

H. R. 15799. An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes;

H. R. 17765. An act to regulate details of majors in the Ordnance Department; and

H. R. 18550. An act empowering and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey by quitclaim deed certain lands in the city of Akron, State of Ohio.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE FOREIGN SERVICE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5614) for the improvement of the foreign service, which were, on page 1, lines 9 and 10, after the word "require," to strike out all down to and including the word "longer," in line 14, and insert "Provided, That any such officer may be assigned for duty in the Department of State without loss of grade, class, or salary, such assignment to be for a period of not more than three years, unless the public interests demand further service, when such assignment may be extended for a period not to exceed one year, and no longer," and on page 4, line 1, after "detail," to insert "not exceeding $5 per day."

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. I understand that the handing down of this bill does not interfere with the right of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who is holding the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the right of the Chair at any time to lay before the Senate messages from the House or communications from the heads of departments.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware that the Chair can hand them down and that they can be received with certain exceptions, but I did not want it to be applied to the right of the Senator from Ohio to the floor.

Mr. STONE. I ask that the Senate concur in the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana withhold his motion for that purpose?

Mr. KERN. I withhold the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6309) to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park, in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes, which were, on page 4, line 18, after "beginning," to insert ", all of said above-described tract now being included within the boundaries of the counties of Grand, Boulder, and Larimer, in the State of Colorado, is hereby reserved and withdrawn from settlement, occupancy, or disposal under the laws of the United States, and said tract is dedicated and set apart as a public park for the benefit and enjoyment of the people of the United States, under the name of the Rocky Mountain National Park."

On page 5, line 16, after "act," to strike out all down to and including "area," page 6, line 5.

On page 7, line 3, after "therein," to strike out all down to and including "therein" in line 4, and insert:

": Provided, That no appropriation for the maintenance, supervision, or improvement of said park in excess of $10,000 annually shall be made unless the same shall have first been expressly authorized by law."

Mr. THOMAS. I ask the Senator from Indiana to withhold his motion until I can move to concur in the amendments of the House.

Mr. KERN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado moves that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator what change the amendments make in the bill?

Mr. THOMAS. The description has been corrected a little, and the provision which devoted the proceeds from the concessions, privileges, and so forth, shall be used for the improvement of the park has been stricken out.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator, Is this an additional national park?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; a new national park.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the Senator's State?

Mr. THOMAS. In my State.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator where the proceeds from the park will go?

Mr. THOMAS. I suppose they will go into the general fund.

Mr. SMOOT. I wondered if the bill provided for it.

Mr. THOMAS. The amendment of the House simply strikes out those two lines on page 7.

Mr. SMOOT. I refer to the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. THOMAS. That is the only material change.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the whole expense of maintaining the park fall upon the Government?

Mr. THOMAS. I forgot to state in answer to the Senator's first question that the bill also provides that the expenditure shall be limited to $10,000 annually, and it is not to be increased except by act of Congress. The elimination of the particular provision to which I refer was, of course, undesirable to the friends of the bill, but it was insisted upon by the House, and it was done, the reason there assigned being that all the funds obtained by concessions, charges for tolls, and so forth, in the park should go into the common fund.

Mr. SMOOT. I had made up my mind that I would oppose the establishment of any more parks where the Government of the United States was called upon to maintain them until after we had passed some kind of a bill creating a bureau to take care of all the parks, and we should find out what they really cost the Government and not have them appropriated for in five different appropriation bills.

Mr. THOMAS. I will state to the Senator it was suggested that this land be given to the State for a park of its own, to be cared for at its own expense. I readily accepted the suggestion, but I could not secure the approval of such a measure by the Interior Department.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senator could secure the approval of the Senate to such a proposition.

Mr. THOMAS. I am quite aware of that.

Mr. SMOOT. And of the Senate Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. THOMAS. I am quite aware of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But we could not introduce such a bill now and get it through at this session. I hope the Senator from Utah will not object to the consideration of this matter now.

Mr. THOMAS. In view of the fact that the Senator from Utah did not oppose the bill at the time it passed the Senate I hope he will not oppose it now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator state the area of the proposed park?

Mr. THOMAS. It is about 230,000 acres. I should add that the area is already in a forest reserve.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator and also to the Senate that I would gladly——

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume it is in a mountain region of the State?

Mr. THOMAS. Entirely; and good for no other purpose in the world.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is about 18 square miles.

Mr. THOMAS. It has been prospected for a great many years and no mineral deposit has ever been found in all the area.

Mr. SMOOT. Continuing, I will say that I would gladly and willingly give all that land to the State of Colorado for a State park. There would not be a question in my mind about it; but there has been and is a question in my mind as to whether we ought to maintain control over the land and be at the expense of maintaining the park within the State. However, Mr. President, as the bill passed the Senate and passed the House, and is sent back here for the approval by the Senate of the House amendments, I shall not object at this time, but I do not believe it is a good practice.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the Senator from Utah.

Mr. JONES. I understand this bill has already passed the Senate and some minor amendments were made in the House. Is that correct?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. What is the nature of the amendments made in the House?

Mr. THOMAS. One amendment eliminated from the bill as it passed the Senate a provision which devoted the proceeds in the way of concessions, toll charges, and so forth, to the improvement of the park. Another amendment limits the expenditure upon it to the sum of $10,000 annually, unless any sum in excess of $10,000 shall have been first expressly authorized by Congress.

Mr. JONES. What requests are likely to come to Congress for the improvement of this national park?

Mr. THOMAS. They may come from the department to the Senate or from those of us who represent the part of the country in which the park is located.

Mr. JONES. I am inclined to hope some requests will come for the improvement of the parks. We have a park in our State that ought to be improved and that we have been trying to get more liberal appropriations for than heretofore, but in the last year or two there seems to have developed some considerable opposition to appropriating money for parks.

Mr. THOMAS. I am in full accord with the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], that there should be a bureau of national parks through which an arrangement would be made, with the consent and concurrence of Congress, for the preservation as well as the development of the parks.

Mr. JONES. I hope that will be done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Senator from Colorado why it would not be better to let the State have the management of it.

Mr. THOMAS. We made an effort to do that, but I could not secure the consent of the Interior Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why should we not surrender all the parks to the States, except the military parks, to be managed by the State?

Mr. THOMAS. I would be glad to have that done; and I will go further and say, if the Senator will support me, I will make the effort to do it.

Mr. JONES. I understood the Senator to say he could not get the consent of the Interior Department to do it.

Mr. THOMAS. That is right.

Mr. JONES. In other words, if Congress wants it, it must get the consent of the Interior Department.

Mr. THOMAS. It means that without such consent it would be hopeless in the House of Representatives.

Mr. JONES. I know the department has control of the matter. In the hope that this will help us in the future to get some appropriation for the developing of our parks that ought to be developed, I am not going to object.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The amendments were concurred in.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GRAND JUNCTION, COLO.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4012) to increase the limit of cost of the United States public building at Grand Junction, Colo., which was to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$175,000."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

H. R. 15799. An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 18550. An act empowering and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey by quitclaim deed certain lands in the city of Akron, State of Ohio.

H. R. 9584. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to sell the present old post office and the site thereof in the city of Jersey City, N. J., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

H. R. 17765. An act to regulate details of majors in the Ordnance Department was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERN presented petitions of the Men's Society of the Lutheran Church of Union City, and of sundry citizens of Wayne and Wanatak, in the State of Indiana, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the United Mine Workers of Duggers, Ind., praying for the enlargement of the Bureau of Mines, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of the Arion Singing Society, of Danbury; of the German-American Central Alliance, of Danbury; and of sundry citizens of Danbury, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of St. Rose's Holy Name Society, of Meriden, Conn., praying for the exclusion of anti-Catholic publications from the mail, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Court of Common Council of Meriden, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. OLIVER presented a memorial of the Manufacturers' Club, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the present tariff law, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Millersville, Waymart, and Ellen Chapel, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Stoneboro, Pa., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to increase the Army and Navy equipment, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WARREN presented petitions of the Christian Union Club, of Kirtley, and of sundry citizens of Florence, in the State of Wyoming, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Worland, Wyo., praying for the enactment of legislation for the regulation of child labor, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Laramie, Wyo., praying for the enactment of legislation to enforce American neutrality, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GALLINGER presented the memorial of R. W. Lyon, of Newton, N. H., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation tending to restrict the freedom of the press, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented petitions of Local Union No. 28, Boot and Shoe Workers' Union, of Manchester, and of Local Union No. 172, United Garment Workers of America, of Keene, in the State of New Hampshire, praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate interstate commerce in convict-made goods, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LIPPITT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Carolina, R. I., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9899) to authorize the laying out and opening of public roads on the Winnebago, Omaha, Ponca, and Santee Sioux Indian Reservations in Nebraska, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 919) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JAMES:

A bill (S. 7329) granting an increase of pension to Pleasant Thomas (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. COLT:
A bill (S. 7330) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Searle (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.
By Mr. KENYON:
A bill (S. 7331) granting an increase of pension to Thomas M. Wall; and
A bill (S. 7332) granting an increase of pension to Hugh M. Cory; to the Committee on Pensions.

CLERKS OF DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. COLT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 15578) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee submitted an amendment providing that the Librarian of Congress shall hereafter, without additional compensation, perform the duties, except those of disbursing officer, required of the superintendent of the building of the Library of Congress as provided in the act approved February 19, 1897, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. R. 19909), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 19424) to extend the time for the completion of the municipal bridge at St. Louis, Mo. This is a bill that is purely local in its character. Congress granted the right to build a bridge across the Mississippi at St. Louis and——
Mr. OVERMAN. There is no objection to it.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?
There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.
Mr. REED. I offer the following amendments. The language of the amendments are in the original grant, but the wording of the bill is not sufficient to cover it.
Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to make an inquiry. This is a House bill?
Mr. REED. It is a House bill.
Mr. GALLINGER. Has the bill ever gone to a committee of the Senate?
Mr. REED. Yes, sir.
Mr. GALLINGER. And it was reported back?
Mr. REED. It has been reported back and is now on the calendar.
Mr. GALLINGER. With amendments?
Mr. REED. The committee did not report the amendments. I did not call the attention of the committee to them.
Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator desires to offer them?
Mr. REED. Yes, sir.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments submitted by the Senator from Missouri will be read.
The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as additional sections to the bill the following:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying into effect the objects of this act, the city of St. Louis may receive, purchase, and also acquire by lawful appropriation and condemnation in the States of Illinois and Missouri, upon making proper compensation, to be ascertained according to the laws of the State within which the same is located, real and personal property and rights of property, and may make any and every use of the same necessary and proper for the construction, maintenance, and operation of said bridge and approaches consistent with the laws of the United States and of said States, respectively.
SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if we ever passed a bridge bill with such a provision in it?
Mr. REED. That was in the original act granting the right to construct the bridge, and it should be renewed when the time is extended.
Mr. SMOOT. I simply wanted to be sure of it.
Mr. REED. Yes; that is in the original act.
The amendments were agreed to.
The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.
The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.
The bill was read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HONOLULU, HAWAII.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate bill 5295.
Mr. KERN. I yield to the Senator from Virginia for that purpose.
The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5295) to amend existing legislation providing for the acquisition of a site and the construction of a building thereon for the accommodation of the post office, United States courts, customhouse, and other governmental offices at Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes.
Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments and ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the conferees be appointed by the Chair.
The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. SWANSON, Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISTRICT EXCISE BOARD.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——
Mr. KERN. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.
Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to offer a resolution and to have it referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey?
Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to object to this request, but I give notice that I shall object to the transaction of any other business.
Mr. HUGHES. What is the request of my colleague—that the resolution go to the calendar?
Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask that the resolution may go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It is the purpose to give the committee which was appointed by the Vice President to-day regarding the excise board authority to send for persons and papers, employ a stenographer, and so forth.
The resolution (S. Res. 522) was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed by the President of the Senate to investigate the conduct of the excise board is hereby further authorized to investigate fully into the manner in which the excise law, so called, is being administered in the District of Columbia; and said committee is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to employ stenographers to report such hearings as may be had at a rate not to exceed $1 per printed page, and to have the testimony and proceedings of such hearings printed for the use of the committee. The expense of such hearings shall be paid out of the contingent expenses of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the said special committee. The said committee is also authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I renew my motion.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.
The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m., Tuesday, January 19, 1915) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 20, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 19, 1915.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.
The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:
Infinite Spirit, Father Soul, out of whose loving heart come all that we see and hear and touch, for these we give Thee hearty thanks. But above all do we thank Thee for those hidden qualities of soul which are ever crystallizing themselves into righteousness, truth, justice, mercy, and love, which make the whole world akin. Grant, O most merciful Father, that we may strive earnestly to develop these values as individuals, as a nation, as a race, until they become the dominant feature of every heart under the spiritual leadership of the Master. Amen.
The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. LINDBERGH. On January 7 there was a letter written by Henry B. Joy, a director of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, addressed to Hon. F. A. Delano, vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Washington, D. C. In this letter are certain statements——
The SPEAKER. Was this letter published?

Mr. LINDBERGH. This letter has been published by sending it to all the Members of Congress and to Senators, to bankers, and to many business houses, and it has been published in many newspapers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. LINDBERGH. There are certain statements in that letter which undertake to charge me with misconduct in office. I will just read those particular statements, because the letter is rather lengthy. I first read from the letter the following:

I certainly am so thoroughly disgusted at dragging of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago into the limelight by Congressman LINDBERGH, of Minnesota, and others that I feel warranted in writing you. I have to-day also written Mr. HAMLIN, of which letter I have sent you a copy. Of course we business men and bankers all felt that the Federal reserve bank would become the football of politicians and of a certain class of newspapers, but it has come so much sooner than I expected.

Then his letter goes on:

In the Chicago Tribune of January 6 is again a long article by the staff correspondent, giving interviews by Congressman LINDBERGH, of Minnesota—

And then naming certain other Members of Congress, whose names I shall not read.

A lot of pure, unadulterated, sensational slush to stir up prejudice and trouble. This I have no doubt is a very laudable object from somebody's point of view, and probably pays, or they wouldn't do it.

Further on in the letter is this expression:

Such gratuitous and unnecessary disturbing of conditions—which so far as I know from any stockholding banks within district No. 7 are working out just as well as it is possible to do and just as fast as it is possible to do under the circumstances—is entirely unwarranted.

Then, on page 2 of the same letter, is this statement:

But that the Federal Reserve Board in Washington should allow itself to be undermined and the Federal reserve system brought into disgrace by ambitious politicians and sensational newspapers is utterly criminal in effect.

Further on there is another clause, as follows:

Is it anything less than criminal for a politician who can enlist the columns of a newspaper of the character of the Chicago Tribune to put out the following statement? The Chicago Tribune prints the following as the words of Mr. LINDBERGH.

Then the statement follows. And then the statement is made, and the statement is attributed to me. Then there is this further clause on the fourth page of the letter:

Any person almost with the sense of a chicken would know that what Mr. LINDBERGH states as being within the possibilities for Mr. Forgan and Mr. Reynolds to do in the way of fixing the rate of interest up and down in the Chicago district is utterly false in every particular.

Now, I introduced a resolution in this House upon which this letter is supposed to be based, but this man could not have seen that resolution at the time he wrote this letter, because it was not in print at that time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The item to which the gentleman refers does not raise a question of personal privilege. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. LINDBERGH. I was coming to that. I would like time to discuss the real question that was involved in a resolution. I introduced House resolution 696, which at bottom is what Mr. Joy based his statement on, for he quoted a part of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman can not get that at this time. We are trying to get an appropriation bill through.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to get one hour's time, and if it is objectionable just now to get that I ask that I may have it at the close of the other business to-day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We can not grant time now to anybody to talk about something not before the House.

Mr. LINDBERGH. This has been a very important problem and involves the rural credit system, and it should be before the House instead of some less important matters.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is nothing more important than doing the business necessary to make it possible to continue the Government of the United States.

Mr. LINDBERGH. If the gentleman will permit, no one, so far as I know, seeks to do that. As every Member knows, I have not obstructed the business of the House in any way, but have always aided to expedite the business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not reflecting on the gentleman, but he understands it is impossible at this time to grant an hour, when the river and harbor bill is waiting to proceed. It may be possible to get time on some bill in general debate.

Mr. LINDBERGH. I will ask that the Chair pass upon the matter of personal privilege.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman does not state a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will make this suggestion to the gentleman [Mr. LINDBERGH]: The Chair could not very well hear the gist of that letter, and if the gentleman will give it to me I will examine it and let him know, not right now, but to-morrow or this evening, whether it contains a question of personal privilege or not. The Chair will examine the letter and see if it really presents a question of personal privilege, and will notify the gentleman. If it does, he has a perfect right to go into it, and if it does not, he can ask for unanimous consent at some convenient time.

Mr. LINDBERGH. The Speaker is certainly fair in his proposition, and I shall gladly await the time of the Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 19422. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points or order on the District appropriation bill.

RIVERS AND HARBORS BILL.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor bill (H. R. 20189).

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the item making appropriations for the Chicago Harbor is reached I may have 20 minutes in which to discuss that question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to objest, I have not any desire to cut the gentleman off when the proper time comes, but I do not think that is an order which ought to be made in the House, because then the committee will have no control over it. It can be made in the committee when the proper time comes.

Mr. MADDEN. I think we ought to make it now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that when the Chicago Harbor item is reached he may have 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ainey	Faison	Kreider	Roberts, Mass.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 282 Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN], that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, pending that, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting some correspondence with Mr. E. A. Drake, vice president of the Panama Railroad Co., and other data, controverting certain statements inserted in the RECORD yesterday emanating from the Boston Chamber of Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Florida that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20189, the river and harbor bill, with Mr. RAINEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20189, the river and harbor bill, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20189) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I regard this bill as one of the cleanest rivers and harbors bills that has ever been reported to the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] I think the men who sat on the Rivers and Harbors Committee are entitled to be congratulated by the membership of this House on the bill they have reported to the House. Unfortunately, on account of the existing condition of the public finances there are some meritorious propositions that it has been impossible for them to place in the bill, but that is not to the bill's discredit. There is not an item in this bill, in my judgment, that can not sustain any attempt to criticize it, and I think it is the duty of this House to stay here and uphold the hands of the chairman of this committee [applause] and allow him to attend to the business of the Government. We are reaching a point where, in the legislative history of this Congress, if the membership of this House are not willing to stay on the floor and furnish a quorum to do business, so that the men in charge of the supply bills can conduct their business in an orderly way, we will not finish the supply bills before the 4th of March, and this branch of the Congress will be responsible to the country for an extra session of Congress. Now, if I am any judge of opinion or the desire of the Nation, the last thing that the people of the United States want to-day is an extra session of Congress. [Prolonged applause.] The responsibility rests upon this side of the House. It is expected that we should do our full duty; and, as your floor leader, I think that I am entitled to ask of you that to-day you do that duty to the uttermost. [Applause.]

There is no reason why this bill should not become a law. There is no reason why it should not be passed before we reach an adjournment to-night. [Applause.] If you go to your offices and leave this floor, then any legislative obstructionist can demand any unreasonable terms from the chairman of your committee. I believe that everybody who is interested in this bill should have opportunity to be heard, and it is far from my desire to interfere with anybody; but I do believe that no man who wants to obstruct legislation on the floor of this House should be furnished with the opportunity to do so merely because he can demand a quorum and thus waste 45 minutes of the Government's time by calling the roll.

So, in all good nature and in a perfectly friendly spirit, I rise now to appeal to the membership of this House, and especially to the Democratic membership, to stay here and see that this bill is passed, if we have to stay until 3 o'clock to-morrow morning. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, may I speak in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I had intended to withdraw the pro forma amendment, but will withhold it if the gentleman desires to speak in opposition.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] were intended in any degree for my benefit. I tender to him the highest respect of anyone in this House as a gentleman of integrity and high standing. But when he says to the Members of this House that one of the cleanest river and harbor bills ever presented to Congress is before them, let me say to him unfortunately he has not been present at all the sessions. I doubt whether he would say so if he had been. But if so, it is because all other bills have not been good. I have shown on this floor from 20 to 30 projects that I can not see how he can defend, and there are others of like character in the bill.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FREAR. I can not be interrupted now, although I should be glad to yield if I had the time. When the gentleman says there is not one item in the bill that can not sustain criticism, I say that is a statement I never heard before on the floor of this House as to a single appropriation bill. I would suggest to him that there are items even in Alabama, on the Tennessee River, that will be criticized on this floor, and I believe justly criticized, and we ought to be heard. I for one have not taken a single minute beyond what was necessary to make statement of conditions surrounding different projects criticized. I have not argued propositions. I have only presented facts here. The courtesy of the House which has been extended to me heretofore is appreciated. I have endeavored simply to present those facts, so that you would know what is in the bill. We ought to know the facts and have no report to help us.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says we ought to finish the bill to-night. Let us finish it if we have to stay 48 hours. A few days ago we were given 11 hours at one sitting, and we sat here uncomplainingly. We are willing to stay here, but let us inquire into every item that appears to deserve criticism. And the gentleman to the contrary notwithstanding, there are items here that I believe the country will criticize, even if he does not. He stands here as the leader of the majority, and, as I said, I tender to him the highest respect. His well-known ability is appreciated by all of us; but I can not believe that the country sustains his position, in view of business conditions that now exist, and in view of some facts that have been presented before this committee. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend H. R. 20189 by striking out lines 14, 15, and 16, on page 24, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Ouachita River, Ark. and La.: For continuing improvement by the construction of Locks and Dams Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, $746,000; for the preparation of plans for Locks Nos. 5 and 9, and for preliminary site surveys for those locks, and for the purchase and taking possession of lands for lock sites, $21,000; for maintenance of improvement by open-channel work up to Camden, $25,000; for maintenance of improvement by open-channel work from Camden to Arkadelphia, $4,000; in all, $796,000."

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, the Ouachita River is a continuing project, or will be if it can get some appropriations in order that that continuance may continue. [Laughter.]

The Board of Engineers recommended appropriations of $796,000 for this project. It is about 52 per cent complete. It has been in progress since 1902. Locks 2, 4, 6, and 8 are 99 per cent completed. Lock 3 is about 21 per cent and Lock 7 about 3 per cent completed. The commerce on this river has been for the past 20 years of an average valuation of over $5,000,000 annually. Now, there are many items in this bill which appropriate twenty, thirty, and forty times the amount that the bill carries for this project which have less than one-fifth the amount of freight in value carried on those streams from year to year.

We have just heard the remarks of the distinguished leader of the majority [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the effect that this is one of the cleanest river and harbor bills ever presented to this House, and he says he believes every item in it can be defended. I will admit that the gentleman's State receives nearly $1,000,000 in this bill, whereas the State of Arkansas, although the Board of Engineers recommended $1,146,000 for that State, receives the pitiful, insignificant, paltry sum of only $41,000. I submit that because a bill is brought in here by the committee that fact does not render the committee infallible. Some gentlemen seem to think that there is a sanctity about this committee, and that the Ark of the Covenant which they have brought into this House must not be touched with profane hands, that we must let it remain inviolate and must not place our hands upon it.

If that is the spirit that is entertained by certain gentlemen of this House, I think we are losing precious and valuable time. Why not suspend the rules and say that inasmuch as the committee has brought in this bill—whether pork barrel or not—let us pass it without consuming one minute of valuable time.

Now, referring to the amendment offered, Mr. Chairman, to this bill, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors did not recommend but $25,000 for this river, although the War Department in making the distribution—and gentlemen on the committee say that they have more judgment than anybody else, and I suspect that they have more judgment than Congress has—notwithstanding that, the War Department gave this river in the neighborhood of $320,000 last year. This year the War Department recommends that this river receive $796,000, but the committee only gives it the sum of $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say something to the gentleman from Arkansas before he presents another amendment.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by striking out lines 14, 15, and 16, on page 24, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Ouachita River, Ark. and La.: For continuing the improvement by construction of locks and dams Nos. 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, and 9, $746,000; for maintenance and improvement, $25,000; in all, $771,000."

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment in reference to a statement which the gentleman made, which I think is incorrect. I want to say that Alabama has not a million dollars in this bill; it is $235,750; and there are only three items in the bill. I know the gentleman is mistaken in the difference between $300,000 and $1,000,000. The States of Florida and Alabama have a river that is not charged in this bill to Alabama.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have only a limited time, and the gentleman from Alabama is a member of the committee, and he can have his own time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I know I can have my own time, but I thought the time to correct a mistake was when the gentleman made it.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, if I am mistaken the conclusions I have drawn on them will be for the inspection of the gentlemen of the House, and they can determine that. I suppose the gentlemen of the committee have made the bill the best they could in their way. I have gone through the bill pretty carefully and impartially, and I want to say that 16 States represented by the members of this committee carry a total of $20,479,460 in this bill. That is out of a total appropriation of $34,138,580.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. I did not hear how much the committee had appropriated for themselves. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I have stated that the bill carries for 16 States, as represented by its Members on the River and Harbor Committee, $20,479,460.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Does that include the appropriations for the Mississippi?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I am about to reach that. The Mississippi River is a great national proposition, and all the political parties are pledged to care for that. There is an appropriation of $6,935,000 for the Mississippi River, which is not chargeable to one State or another, because that river drains 31 States, and is the great artery through which the waters between the Allegheny and the Rockies finally find their way.

Mr. CALLAWAY. It is not necessary for this appropriation to make it drain those States.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The Government recognizes that the protection of the Mississippi is a necessity.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is it not a fact that the gentleman from Mississippi, who is considered an expert on the Mississippi, says in his million-dollar book that there are 16,000,000 acres of land which can be reclaimed and put into profitable cultivation if the water can be kept off it? And is it not a fact that these appropriations are very largely made to protect the land from floods that go down the Mississippi instead of enabling the Mississippi to drain these 31 States? The Mississippi drained those States before Columbus discovered America. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will make no reply to that. That can be interpreted by the various members of the committee. Now, you subtract the amount that goes to the 16 States from the total amount in the bill, and it leaves $6,722,120 to be divided between the 32 States not represented on the Rivers and Harbors Committee. Less than $7,000,000 go to 32 States, and more than $20,000,000 go to 16 States. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that I am not after an appropriation for my district to the exclusion of other meritorious propositions, but I do submit to the membership of this House that an equitable distribution is not manifest in this bill, at least it does not stand out in bold relief. I append herewith a tabulated statement showing discriminations in detail:

Total appropriations to projects for 16 States.

There are many propositions here, little two-by-four propositions, cared for most lavishly by this bill, and I submit that if the committee is infallible why waste the time, why not put the question at once to the House sitting in Committee of the Whole and vote upon the bill and proceed to other important and pressing legislation?

Mr. GORDON. Name those propositions that are so rotten.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Oh, I have not the time just here, but will reach that later on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit a few unnecessary remarks. [Laughter.] It is always interesting to listen to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GOODWIN]——

Mr. FOSTER. Arkansas.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Arkansas. His remarks during the past few days were so frequently directed to the State of North Carolina that momentarily I misplaced him. It is always interesting to listen to him. We can never forget that classic he delivered the other evening on French Broad, Smiths Creek, and the Swannanoa. We were all delighted. We were fascinated with it, charmed by the magic of the gentleman's eloquence and the beauty of his imagery. To-day he again criticizes the committee, as he has done ever since the bill was on the floor—for he has done all he could to prejudice this House and the country against the bill—but when it was suggested by a gentleman a moment ago that the Mississippi River was taken care of, it was also interesting to note how readily the gentleman from Arkansas then flew to the defense of that great stream. Let it be remembered that the appropriations carried in the bill for that stream are to be expended largely for the protection from the floods of the Mississippi River of the people of the St. Francis Basin, in Arkansas, and of Desha and Chicot Counties, in the gentleman's district. When I realize the tremendous interest his people have in this, and as I watched the gentleman capering nimbly before this body during the past several days, first opposing and now defending the bill, I, too, have been reminded of another classic, one entirely familiar to the gentleman from Arkansas. It runs about like this:

De squirrel, he jumped from limb to limb,
And de possum sot and looked at him;
Den said dat possum to himself,
"Dat fool squirrel's gwine to kill hisself."

[Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Arkansas the other day tried to reduce one appropriation $400, does not the gentleman from Mississippi think we ought now to give him an increase of $700,000 for his proposition? [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas insisted that it was ridiculous and wicked to expend money for the improvement of a stream, Smiths Creek, when we proposed to appropriate less than 2 per cent of the value of the commerce floated upon it for maintenance. Yet he insists vigorously upon the Government now appropriating money for a stream in the State of Arkansas to the extent of 50 per cent of the value of the commerce floated upon it. Oh, yes; the gentleman wants to be fair. He says that the committee has "hogged" the appropriations. Mr. Chairman, I have been upon this committee during the past 10 years, and I desire to state the appropriations that have been carried for the State of Arkansas and the State of Mississippi during that time. I do not include in these figures appropriations for the Ouachita expended in Louisiana or for the Red expended beyond the boundaries of the State of Arkansas. I have been criticized also by gentlemen from Louisiana. I hope they will give attention to this, for this is a fair sample of the value of their criticism. Six bills have been reported and passed since 1905, including the bill of that year, and in three of them Arkansas had appropriations larger than were carried for the State of Mississippi. In all six of them Louisiana had larger appropriations, and in three of the bills Mississippi had larger appropriations than Arkansas. In all six of the bills, however, combined Arkansas has $2,928,450, Louisiana has $8,479,942, while Mississippi, in all six of them, had $2,322,480. Arkansas, in other words, had $600,000 more than Mississippi. In this particular bill, because the engineers said they had money enough to carry on existing projects in the State of Arkansas without serious detriment to them, no further sum was appropriated; and now the gentleman comes on the floor and ridicules the committee, and, so far as lay in his power, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN] has prejudiced this House and has prejudiced the country against a bill in which his constituents have as deep an interest as any constituency in these United States. [Applause.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and the amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer, and I object.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and the amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Florida——

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. This refers to the particular paragraph respecting the Ouachita River?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is all.

Mr. WINGO. It would not affect the Arkansas or the Red?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. It would not affect any other. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I send up an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one amendment pending before the House at the present time.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, does that eliminate me? I was recognized by the Chair and had the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, in view of what the leader of the majority, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], has stated here this morning, I think it is quite proper to call his attention to a clause from Jefferson's Manual. I read now from Jefferson's Manual:

Mr. Onslow, the ablest among the Speakers of the House of Commons, used to say, "It was a maxim he had often heard when he was a young man, from old and experienced members, that nothing tended more to throw power into the hands of administration and those who acted with the majority of the House of Commons than a neglect of or departure from the rules of proceeding——

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I submit the gentleman is not addressing himself to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed to address his remarks to the matter under consideration.

Mr. DONOVAN (continuing)— operated as a check and control on the action of the majority, and that they were in many instances a shelter and protection to the minority against the attempt of power.

The leader of the majority has stated that this was a most meritorious measure. If he had been present while the matter had been debated, he would have found that not a single Member here has claimed that this is a matter of merit, but, on the contrary, that it was not a question of merit. That is the position taken by the gentleman from Washington and by the ranking Member of the minority, that this was not a matter of merit; and the gentleman from North Carolina who replied to the gentleman from Virginia said that they did not consider the present or future needs of commerce in framing this bill. So I take it it is somewhat a strange definition of the word "merit" as used by the leader of the majority, and the committee does not claim it in framing the bill. Again, we have the remarkable significance of the silence of the leader of the minority [Mr. MANN] when we have for his city here an appropriation of several hundred thousand dollars that is entirely new, not authorized by any law, and it is most——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONOVAN. With pleasure.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I want to say the gentleman is entirely mistaken about the item for Chicago, because it is an old project, one that we have appropriated for heretofore, and it is put into the bill as a continuing work and authorized.

Mr. DONOVAN. Not authorized by law——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Authorized by law.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman provides for an unexpended balance to be spent for that proposition entirely new, and the proposition of the Chicago appropriation is on a par with that of the gentleman from Norfolk, Va., and on a par with the Connecticut proposition that have been modified three times. Oh, the gentleman, the leader of the minority, rounded up his crew the other day against the Connecticut proposition, and those who are favorably inclined either absented themselves or else remained in their seats. That is the condition of things here, and our majority leader calls these things meritorious action. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the admonition of the leader of the majority here I propose to act within my own rights according to parliamentary procedure, the gentleman from Alabama to the contrary notwithstanding.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment. As I understand, the time has expired on this paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by striking out lines 14, 15, and 16, page 24, and insert the following:

"Ouachita River, Ark. and La.: For continuing improvement by construction of locks and dams and for maintenance, $300,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a committee amendment. Between lines 16 and 17 insert——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Does the other gentleman from Arkansas desire to offer an amendment to the pending paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas have an amendment to offer to the pending paragraph?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARTER. If an amendment were offered to the present paragraph, debate can not be had upon it?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is all exhausted.

Mr. CARTER. And if an amendment is offered as a separate provision, debate is not closed upon it?

The CHAIRMAN. If it is offered as a separate paragraph, debate is not closed.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Has debate closed on the paragraph sought to be amended by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN]?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. I will ask that this be passed, then.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer his amendment now?

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Yes; I desire to offer it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after line 16, on page 24, the following: "Arkansas River, Ark.: For maintenance of improvements, including work at Pine Bluff and operation of dredging plant, $237,500."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, that is the amendment, except the difference in amount, that I propose to offer myself. That is the amendment I offer as a committee amendment.

Mr. JACOWAY. Will the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. JACOWAY. I want to ask the chairman if the amendment offered by him covers the same territory and is for the same improvements as the amendment offered by the gentleman, my colleague from Arkansas?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The same project exactly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. The only difference is in the amount?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The only difference is in the amount.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the gentleman desire the new paragraph to be inserted?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Exactly at the same place as a new paragraph, between lines 16 and 17.

The CHAIRMAN. Under those circumstances the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Florida first, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 24, by inserting, after line 16, as a new paragraph, the following: "Arkansas River, Ark. and Okla.: For maintenance of improvement, including work at Pine Bluff and operation of dredging plant, $150,000."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, if I am entitled to the floor, may I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first hear the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think to the committee is due some explanation of the amendment which the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has instructed me to offer at this point. When in the preparation of the river and harbor bill we reached the item of the Arkansas River we were of the impression that there was a sufficient amount of money on hand or available to keep two dredging plants that have recently been constructed for use on that river in operation from the 4th of next March until the 30th of June of next year, the period covered by the estimates. I was under that impression down to a very few days ago and until after the consideration of this bill had begun, when I was informed by the Assistant Chief of Engineers that he did not have money enough and would need at least that sum of money to carry on this work during the period mentioned. I may say further that the work on the river had been going on for many years until a large sum of money had been expended—something between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000. Finally it was concluded to revise the project so that something definite could be reached, and in the bill of 1910 two projects were adopted having for their purpose the construction of two large dredge boats which it was estimated would require $118,000 a year to operate. These dredges have been completed and are now in use, and this sum of money is needed for their operation.

Now, we arrive at the sum of $150,000 in this way: The estimate, as I said, was for $118,000 each year to keep these dredges at work, and as the period to be covered is about 16 months we have added the amount necessary to make the difference, which approximates $150,000.

Now, we did not want this work to be neglected. It was not the purpose of the committee to do this. Having constructed those dredges, it would be unwise to let them lie idle and not use them. I want to say further that the engineers call this a tentative project—that is, one that is to be carried on for experimentation—and we want to not only do the experimenting but to substantially improve that river if it is possible to do so, and we think it is. We think it is a very meritorious amendment, and we hope it will prevail.

Mr. FERRIS. I observe that the amendment offered by the chairman states that $115,000 is to be used for Oklahoma and Arkansas on the Arkansas River. I wonder if the gentleman would be able to give us information as to how the money would be divided between the two States? Has he that information?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I could not do that. The item, I think, is the same item we inserted in the bill last year except the amount. The language is about the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida may have another minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida may have another minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS. How much dredging has actually been done on the Oklahoma side of the Arkansas River?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I can not answer that offhand.

Mr. FERRIS. Has any money of any kind, at any time, been spent on the Arkansas River on the Oklahoma side?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I could not say as to that.

Mr. FERRIS. We know every year that we get a lot of resolutions, but we never get any money.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman from Florida yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will.

Mr. POWERS. We could not hear very well over here. If we understand your statement correctly, the reason this paragraph has been inserted is the reason that you had information from the Engineers of the Army that there was enough money on hand, but later received information that was not true?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I will detain the House by saying that the amount carried by my amendment—$237,500—is exactly the sum recommended by the engineers and as carried in the estimates.

The Arkansas River, Mr. Chairman, is one of the great rivers of this country. It is 1,460 miles in length, of which 320 miles are in Arkansas. You can imagine the great volume of water that comes down the Arkansas River. It stands in importance next, or even equal to, the great Ohio River. It runs through one of the richest and most fertile countries known. It passes through the great commercial cities of Fort Smith, our capital city of Little Rock, and the city of Pine Bluff, my home city, and splits the great cotton region of Arkansas in the middle. There is a great volume of commerce that is now and could be handled on this river if it was only put in proper condition. The city of Little Rock annually handles over 200,000 bales of cotton and the city of Pine Bluff from 150,000 to 200,000 bales.

My home county annually produces about 61,000 bales of cotton. There is a milling plant in my city cutting 250,000 feet of lumber daily. There is a great deal of commerce to be handled which I have not time to mention, but on account of want of river improvement the railroads get it and our people are cut out of cheap freight rates that would, with cheap river transportation, benefit our people and enhance the volume of commerce on the river.

Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism to make of the committee. I believe they are all honorable gentlemen and have done what they thought was right. It seems to some that favoritism appears in the bill to a particular State represented on the committee. I know nothing about that. If it so happens, it would be but natural. But realizing that the Arkansas River is not likely to get more than is suggested by the committee, being an amount of $150,000, I withdraw my amendment and hope you will sustain the recommendation which the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has just now made. [Applause.]

While it has been argued that new projects should not be considered in this bill, I should state that, in so far as the Arkansas River is concerned, Congress has long since recognized it as a river of navigation that should be looked after, improved, and maintained. Reading from the report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army for the year 1914, as to this river, which is in the charge of Maj. A. B. Putnam, Corps of Engineers, and Division Engineer Col. C. McD. Townsend, I quote:

An act of Congress approved June 13, 1902, merged those two general projects into one, which makes the existing general project in substance "the improvement of the river from its mouth to the head of navigation by snagging operations, by dredging operations, and by contraction works, holding the improved channel by revetment where necessary." No definite estimate of cost can be given.

Dredging project: By act of June 25, 1910, Congress adopted a definite dredging project based on reports printed in House Documents No. 71, Sixty-first Congress, first session, and No. 510, Sixty-first Congress, second session. The contemplated work is that of procuring and operating two suction dredges between the mouth of the river and Ozark, 318 miles, at an estimated cost of $349,000 for plant and $118,000 annually for its operation, the object being to aid and encourage navigation.

Originally this work was reported under a separate heading. By act of February 27, 1911, it was consolidated with the other projects under the general heading "Improving Arkansas River."

The act of June 25, 1910, authorized under this appropriation title maintenance of the works at Pine Bluff, Ark. Therefore by combining the dredging project of June 25, 1910, and the general project of June 13, 1902, a combination effected by act of February 27, 1911, and this authorization the existing project now is the improvement of the river from its mouth to Ozark (318 miles) by operating two suction dredges; from its mouth to the head of navigation by snagging operations, by dredging operations, and by contraction works, holding the improved channel by revetment where necessary; and maintenance of the works at Pine Bluff, Ark. No estimate for completion can be given.

The range between extreme high water and extreme low water at Fort Smith is 35.5 feet; at Little Rock, 30 feet; and at Pine Bluff, farther down the river, necessarily more; and at the mouth of the river, where the stage is controlled more or less by the Mississippi River, is from 40 to 50 feet.

The great need of dredge boats is to protect the river from caving banks and shifting sand bars, and snag boats are required to remove great trees and logs which lodge in the river bed, thereby preventing more or less navigation. It has been urged in debate here that this river since the year 1910 has been decreasing in commerce. Such, Mr. Chairman, appears to be true from the engineers' report, and so it is with other rivers. This is not on account of the commerce in the country that could be carried on the bosom of this river, but is solely due to the fact that the navigability of it has been impaired these years because of obstructions which interfered. With this river free from all obstructions, considering the depth of the water and its width, the largest vessels which go up and down the Mississippi River could traverse the Arkansas River as high up as our capital city, Little Rock. The full amount in the amendment which I have just offered should be granted this river, as have said the engineers, and I am sorry that I can not obtain it; but feeling that this is all that I can hope to get into the bill now, I will accept it without further resistance, since the chairman of the committee, Mr. SPARKMAN, of Florida, asserts that with the sum on hand unexpended the needed improvement will be taken care of.

Mr. DAVENPORT and Mr. JACOWAY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JACOWAY] is recognized.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, under the recommendations of the Board of Engineers an item of $237,000 should be carried in this bill to properly take care of the urgent and pressing needs of the Arkansas River in the matter of dredging operations on this river as far up as Ozark at least. This is no new project, and has the solemn sanction of the Board of Engineers of the War Department. Some few years since, after a survey of the river and commenting on its needs, D. W. Lockwood, colonel, Corps of Engineers, and senior member of the board, concludes an exhaustive report on this proposition by recommending that estimates be prepared for a dredging plant suitable for the work of maintaining a channel of 3½ feet in depth between Little Rock and Ozark, and also for obtaining such a channel by open-river improvement with or without the aid of dredging. The bill under discussion, as reported to the House, is conspicuous for the fact that no mention is made for an appropriation for the Arkansas River to cover this item, although same was recommended by the Board of Engineers for the War Department in its last report to Congress. That such should not be the case and the bill should carry an item of $237,000, we but have to look into the facts only casually to demonstrate the compelling need for this appropriation by Congress at this time. For some reason the committee—and I wish to add I believe unintentionally—omitted this item. The facts that I shall quote to this House in support of my contention that the item of $237,000 should be written in this bill are more than amply borne out by the recommendations of the office of the Engineering Department of the Government. That this item should be incorporated in the bill as it passes the House is Arkansas's due. That this amendment should prevail is imperative for the proper development of that great State that I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, and which she so richly deserves. Let us examine into the facts for a moment. In the biennial report of the Bureau of Mines, Manufactures, and Agriculture for the State of Arkansas as early as 1905 and 1906 gives the coal production of the State for that period as 1,875,569 tons, and the distribution of that year's output is as follows:

	Tons.
Sebastian County	1,096,159
Franklin County	339,449
Johnson County	229,477
Pope County	38,875
Logan County	20,950
Scott County	50,659
Strip pits and smaller mines	100,000
Making a grand total of (for coal alone, to say nothing of an increasing tonnage on other products)	1,875,569

Since that time this output has greatly increased.

As an illustration, we will take Denning, located in Franklin County, Ark., a distance of 119 miles from Little Rock, as representing the average point of origin for coal shipments, and taking one-half cent a ton-mile as a reasonable charge for haulage and 20 cents a ton flat for terminal costs on account of short haul, the reasonable rate out of the Arkansas fields to Little Rock becomes 80 cents a ton, a reduction of 45 cents a ton on the present rate. These two points just mentioned are the extreme points of transportation, in so far as my district is concerned. What is true of Little Rock would be proportionately true of the towns of Argenta, Spadra, London, Ozark, Denning, Hartman, Lamar, Clarksville, Russellville, Dardanelle, Morrillton, Conway, Atkins, Plumerville, and other towns located between Denning and Little Rock. During the year of 1908 Little Rock consumed 193,000 tons of coal, which is equivalent to practically one-third of the output of the fields adjacent to the reaches of the river under examination at that time. Based on the freight-rate reduction of 45 cents a ton just mentioned, the total saving to Little Rock alone in one year would be $86,850 on account of coal rates being placed on a reasonable basis as a result of the Arkansas River becoming a "used river." The Board of Engineers further makes the observation that the saving to other towns using Arkansas coal would be equal proportionately to that of Little Rock, and which would swell the total savings to the immense amount of $173,700, savings on coal rates alone, to say nothing of the probability of a reduction in mine price, due to the opportunity for the independent operator to keep his product on the market at all times. I again invite the attention of the committee to the fact that Little Rock annually handles some 400,000 bales of cotton, as I now recall the figures. It is estimated that approximately one-third of this cotton comes from the territory adjacent to the Arkansas River between Little Rock and Ozark. Sometime since the Little Rock Board of Trade furnished a statement showing the most important tonnage originating in that territory and terminating at Little Rock, and it is as follows:

	Tons.
Cotton	27,677
Cotton seed	14,450
Hay	12,000
Cooperage stuffs	24,375
Produce	5,200
Wood	7,500
Not classified	31,600
Total	122,802

Since the compilation of this table this tonnage has generously increased from year to year.

It may be further argued that the effect of "used rivers" on cotton freight rates may be shown in the fact that cotton shipped from Little Rock to New Orleans, 487 miles, is 55 cents; cotton shipped from Memphis to New Orleans, 396 miles, 25 cents; cottonseed products from Little Rock to New Orleans, 15 cents; cottonseed products from Memphis to New Orleans, 10 cents.

From these figures it can be seen that where river and rail are in competition the rate on cotton is about one-half and the rate on cottonseed products is about two-thirds of that where there is a lack of competition of that nature. The board of trade in my home town, Dardanelle, Ark., reports that at one time the rate on cotton from that town to Little Rock was 25 cents a hundred, and that the old steamboat rate was 15 cents a hundred, making a difference of 10 cents per hundredweight, or a saving of 50 cents a bale in favor of river transportation between Dardanelle and Little Rock. In so far as the benefits of river transportation are concerned, what is true of Dardanelle and Little Rock is equally true of the other towns between Little Rock and Ozark, to which I have just referred.

It may be interesting to note that a recapitulation of the probable decrease in annual freight rates within the territory between Little Rock and other points may be summed up as follows:

Decrease on coal freights, outbound	$173,700
Decrease on cotton crop, outbound	47,420
Decrease on general freights, outbound	225,890
Decrease on general freights, inbound	220,000
A total saving in freight charges of	667,010

In other words, for every dollar of an appropriation this Congress may give to this project is a saving of $3 in reduced freight rates to the people.

As stated in the report to the War Department, if we estimate that 40 per cent of the output of the coal fields east of Ozark is consumed by the railroads and not affected by water transportation we have as a statement of commerce directly affected by the river as follows:

Outbound:	Tons.
Coal	400,000
Cotton	28,000
Hay	12,000
Cooperage stuffs	24,000
Produce	5,000
Wood	7,000
Not classified	32,000
Inbound, not classified	100,000

Or a total tonnage which is influenced by the river of 622,000 tons.

Again, it has been estimated that with these dredge boats operating between Little Rock and Ozark that in about 17 months all the shoals between these two points could be cleared of obstruction and a channel made and maintained, and then the question is solved.

For the benefit of the committee I desire to make the further observation that unless this item is written in this bill the two magnificent dredges now built and ready for work will be compelled to lie idle for 18 months. I am informed by the War Department this morning that this will cost the Government $18,000 and not a single dollar's worth of benefit will result. It will be a dead loss of this amount. I am sure the committee will agree with me that this will be a most unwise business policy, especially so when we find that these boats cost $400,000.

It might be germane in this discussion to add that between the cities of Little Rock and Ozark that there is a magnificent and proven working coal field that would bring traffic on the Arkansas River when this river is properly dredged and open for traffic. The amount of this inchoate tonnage is overwhelmingly eloquent and convincing. It is as follows:

	Acres.
Shinn Basin	3,000
Ouita Basin	2,500
Spadra, north side of river	14,000
Prairie View, south side of river	20,000
Denning	6,000
Paris	4,000

Making a total of 49,000 acres in all, which alone in time would bring, subject to river transportation, 200,000,000 tons of coal, to say nothing of the tonnage that would also be gathered in by this stream in the way of timber, farm products, and other items of commerce too numerous to mention at this time.

It can readily be seen that the immense saving to the people living in the towns of Ozark, Denning, Hartman, Lamar, Knoxville, Spadra, Clarksville, Russellville, Dardanelle, Morrillton, Conway, and Argenta, as well as to the people living adjacent thereto on freight alone, to say nothing of the decreased cost per ton as a result of river transportation, would be stupendous in its nature. These facts and this argument, if not complemented with other facts and arguments, make plain why the amendment should prevail if there were no other facts argued in support of it. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to incorporate as a part of my remarks on this occasion a table showing comparative rates in cents per 100 pounds, on classes and commodities, river and rail, to Little Rock, but on account of the limited time given to me for the discussion of the matter I will be unable to recite these figures in full to the committee. It may be stated in a word, however, that the beneficent results, as shown by this table, that would flow to the people of my district as a result of continuous river traffic, as well as the benefits that would go to other portions of the State, would be told in the story of the saving of multiplied thousands of dollars in freight bills to the people in that territory through which the great Arkansas River runs. To the people as a whole freight rates that are fair and not prohibitive are most essential to the proper development of the country.

Rates by rail on cotton, in cents per 100 pounds.

To Monroe, La., 530 miles	2.25
To Alexandria, La., 630 miles	2.60

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in the form of a hasty summary that when the plan of making the Arkansas River navigable from its mouth up as far as Ozark in Franklin County and maintaining a channel of 3½ feet as recommended by the Board of Engineers as entirely feasible and practicable, is carried to a successful consummation, it will mean a decrease of freight rates on coal, cotton, general freights outbound, and general freights inbound, of at least $700,000 per annum to the people of Arkansas. It means that there will be a competitor to the railroads that will enable the people living in this territory to ship every form of their products to a central market under freight rates that are not prohibitive. In a sense it will mean a day of deliverance, the coming of a greater progress for Arkansas. It will mean the saving of thousands of dollars to the towns located on this great watercourse in the form of coal bills and reduced freight rates of many thousands of dollars. Also, it will give to the city of Argenta and the city of Little Rock, the capital of my Commonwealth, and other places in my district, cheap coal as a result of cheap freight rates that will enable them to successfully solve some of the commercial and industrial problems with which they have to contend to-day. It may be termed as meaning a new era of development and prosperity that will be retarded until these conditions are made possible. I am no authority upon the feasibility or the practicability of the improvement of our streams, but the great Engineering Department of this country states in its official reports and recommends to Congress that it is practicable and feasible, and this should convince those who are of a doubting nature. Mr. Chairman, there is no necessity for Little Rock, Argenta, and other Arkansas cities to purchase yearly thousands of tons of coal from Illinois or any other State, and when this condition is forced upon the people of Arkansas it compels her to pay tribute to northern capital and northern labor when this homage should be given to Arkansas capital and Arkansas labor. It may be stated that in so far as coal is concerned, we are a rich people in disguise. We can see that which is justly ours but will be unable to reach it until this Government appropriates sufficient money to make navigable the Arkansas. Slumbering within the earth and under 49,000 acres of land just mentioned there is an inchoate and proven tonnage of 200,000,000 tons of coal alone that could go to river transportation, and which would go far toward making the Arkansas River in time one of the greatest streams that ever bore the white sails of commerce to the seas. The testimony I have submitted in support why this amendment should prevail is not the testimony of myself, or that which is biased and prejudiced, but the testimony of an arm of the Engineering Corps of the United States Government that made its report to Congress some few years since, and for this reason it should have its proper and convincing weight with the committee to-day.

Mr. Chairman, in the distant past the time was when Arkansas was called the Bear and Bowie-knife State. In part this was attributable to the story of the Arkansas Traveler and other slanderous statements that fell from reckless pens. But that period has passed forever. It is now less than a memory. Arkansas has long since caught the stirring strains of the martial music of progress and year in and year out is keeping step like a well-trained soldiery. So overwhelming is the sum total of her accomplishments in the agricultural, commercial, industrial, and business world, in the educational and professional world, in the arts and the sciences, and in the field of letters that she has written an eternal traverse upon the accusations of those who have sought to belittle her. To-day there are but two classes of people that would slander or heap discredit upon the name of Arkansas, those that are densely ignorant or morbidly envious.

The Arkansas River should be permanently improved and open to navigation. This is true of the other great rivers of the State. It is Arkansas's just due. When she receives the benefit of "used rivers" it means the day of deliverance from exorbitant and prohibitive freight rates, and the coming of new era of a greater and far-reaching development for the entire State.

In conclusion, I desire to say that I do not want to occupy the position before the committee to-day of being a political highwayman. Neither do I want to obstruct any needful and useful legislation. I refuse to be put in the class of the dog in the manger. In my judgment, I speak for the greatest district represented upon this floor, inhabited by a progressive, patriotic, intelligent, and potential people. Within this domain, to me, is the greatest capital of all the capitals of this Government, that of Little Rock. As a rule, generally I do not occupy this floor in useless discussion, still I shall always reserve the right, when I feel that the great State that I have the honor in part to represent has been for some cause discriminated against unjustly, to submit certain observations and raise my provincial voice, and to the utmost do all that is possible commensurate with my ability, and which falls within the pale of what is right, to contend for those benefits and those privileges that my district is entitled to and the State of Arkansas should have as a matter of absolute right and justice. Mr. Chairman, I earnestly hope that the amendment will prevail. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVENPORT rose.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close. How much time does the gentleman from Oklahoma desire?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. I make the same request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN]?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT] is recognized.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. If a unanimous-consent agreement is entered into, would it prevent the offering of an amendment to the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It would prevent discussion beyond five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. I simply want to offer a substitute for the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I think I feel somewhat differently from the gentlemen who have preceded me. I have no fault to find with the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, but I am very strongly in favor of the amendment that has been offered by the chairman of the committee.

To my part of the State of Oklahoma the navigation of the Arkansas River is an important thing, and without improving the Arkansas River in the State of Arkansas we can get no benefit whatever in Oklahoma. It has been carried for a number of years by the engineers as one project, notwithstanding we have not had any improvement made upon the Arkansas River in Oklahoma except pulling out some snags along the channel by the Government.

Up until 1888 the Arkansas River, in what was then Indian Territory and is now Oklahoma, was navigated as far up the river as the town of Fort Gibson. Reference has been made to the benefit that it would be to a number of cities in the State of Arkansas. Commencing with the city of Tulsa, in the State of Oklahoma, Muskogee and other towns along the Arkansas River, down the Arkansas Valley to the State line, would all be greatly benefited in the way of freight rates as well as shipping out the products of coal and timber along the Arkansas River, which they can not now do, because it makes it too expensive to get these products out of the bends of the river and carry them to the railroad lines, with the distance they would have to haul. We are anxious to have some improvement made to the Arkansas River. We in Oklahoma feel, as well as the gentleman from Arkansas, that there are many streams of the United States that are improved for navigation that have no more water and no more commerce than the river Arkansas has. It is true that for a number of years our section of Oklahoma through which the Arkansas River flows had no Representative upon the floor of this House, and when the railroads were built through that section of country, from that day on until this, it has been difficult to get any recognition of the people along the Arkansas River in Oklahoma, because it seemed that people thought our commerce could be satisfactorily transported over the lines of railroad. I trust this House will adopt the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee, and by so doing I believe it will greatly benefit the people of Oklahoma as well as the people of Arkansas. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] offers a substitute for the pending committee amendment. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO as substitute for the committee amendment:

"Arkansas River, from its mouth to the head of navigation, by snagging operations, by dredging operations, and by contraction work, holding the improved channel by revetment where necessary, $500,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, has the time allotted upon this amendment been consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The time has all been consumed.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And on the substitute as well?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. All time has expired. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cache River, Ark.: For maintenance, $3,000.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I never got in on this Arkansas River——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer some amendment?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes; Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I want to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the expenditure that has been made on this river, with the result up to the present time. I do this not because I have any desire to criticize the Arkansas expenditure. It is in harmony with all the expenditures in this bill as far as results are concerned.

On the Arkansas River there has been expended up to the present time $3,153,784. Is it a new project? Oh, no. Are they only just beginning to dredge now with some new-fangled boats? Oh, no. Have the engineers just reported on this? Oh, no; they have been working on this thing from so far back that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. They have expended on it $3,153,784. Have they got any commerce? Oh, no. All these men say they have not got it, but they are going to get it, the Lord knows when. Is it getting better with all this expenditure through the years? Oh, no. The freight has been gradually declining on that river. For the last 20 years the average tonnage has been 77,000 tons, but last year it was 55,000 tons. Is the commerce improving by this expenditure? Oh, no; they just hope to improve it. The average expenditure on the river for the last 20 years has been $66,000 a year.

Mr. JACOWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. JACOWAY. I will ask the gentleman where he gets his figures, 55,000 tons for the Arkansas River? On what portion of the river is that, or does it include all of the river?

Mr. CALLAWAY. I get it from the engineer's reports.

Mr. JACOWAY. I hold in my hand the report of the engineers' department for 1910, and in the recapitulation it shows that the established tonnage at that time was 662,000 tons. That is signed by the officer of engineers of the War Department.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I was talking about 1914.

Mr. JACOWAY. I want to say to the gentleman that he is wrong about that.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I have the engineer's report here, and am quoting from the engineer's reports on this.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to criticize the Arkansas River particularly, because, as I said, the Arkansas River is exactly on a par with the Trinity and the Brazos and the Kissimme and the intercoastal canal and all the other river appropriations in this bill, nearly. That is the thing I object to. The gentleman who said it was not a question of merit with this committee was correct in that statement.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a minute?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have no apologies to make for the Kissimme River, but it is not in this bill.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I am glad it has been cut out. That is one good work we did.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I cut it out because there was no money needed there.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Some gentleman on the floor said it was not a question of merit. Take the statements of the committee. Running back through this entire discussion I have collated some statements of this committee in defense of these propositions on that question of merit. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS], in answer to a question, said:

I will tell you I am getting very tired of being skinned by Members who do not know "straight up" on this floor. I have been on this River and Harbor Committee for 12 years. I have worked faithfully and tried my best to do the best for the rivers and harbors of the country. If we are going to take on a new project, then how will we keep from another new project, and another one, and another new one, and so on, endlessly?

Any merit? Oh, no.

There were 24 projects in the last bill that had conditions. There were 74 new projects. All of those have gone out, every one of them, without discussion of the merits. Mr. Chairman, I hate to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT], for I love him very dearly, and I hate to oppose the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], who is, I hope, to be the new governor of Maryland. That is the naval part of it. Yes; but that does not appeal much to me, although I think, perhaps, that is a matter to be considered when we take on any new projects; but it is idle to discuss the merits of any of these propositions. The only rule that could be adopted after much thought, after much discussion, was the one which we have come in and built this bill upon, that no new projects will be considered, no matter what their merits are.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] says:

It is not a question of merit. Let us treat everybody alike in this House. If there is any member of the committee who is receiving undue favor in this bill, I will vote to take it away if you will point it out. Let us treat everybody alike.

That sounds like a discussion on the pension bill. Some fellow says, "How does it happen? I want the committee to explain; they have 30 bills apiece, while I have got but 10." The chairman of the committee says: "If the gentleman will possess his soul in patience until we get through, we will see that they are equally distributed and that everybody is treated fairly."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Was the gentleman referring in his last remarks to me?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Not to the chairman of this committee. Let us treat everybody alike, says the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. Now comes Mr. EDWARDS:

Now, if you put on this new project because of Mr. MAHAN'S influence in the House, what answer have I got to give to the people of Savannah, the great city that I come from? The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MAHAN] has no better friend on the floor of the House than I am to him; but what answer can I give to the people of my district and the people of Georgia when they say to me, "The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MAHAN] was able to rise on the floor of the House, and, although not a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, to put an amendment on the bill for a new project, while you, a member of the committee, were not able to get a new project that we so much desired"?

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. I yield to my friend from Missouri.

Mr. RUSSELL. Can the gentleman inform us what is the amount of new projects that have been proposed and favorably recommended?

Mr. EDWARDS. There are 134 of them, approximating, I understand, something like $150,000,000, favorably passed upon by the engineers.

Mr. RUSSELL. And there are new projects that have been shut out by the committee which, if put on, would increase it about $150,000,000?

Mr. EDWARDS. Approximately it would increase it about $150,000,000 if all of them were put on.

Mr. RUSSELL. And the committee thinks that the bill, as now reported to the House, containing old projects, is just as much as the condition of the Treasury will permit?

Mr. EDWARDS. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new paragraph after the last line read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 24, by inserting, after line 18, the following: "Red River, Ark. and La. and Tex., $140,000."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I will not attempt to discuss in five minutes the necessities of this Red River project. I am, of course, interested in the Arkansas River and in the Red River. Anyone who is familiar with the Southwest knows that the Arkansas and the Red Rivers occupy the same relation to the southwestern part of the country that the Ohio River does to the Ohio Valley. I recognize the fact, Mr. Chairman, that unfortunately the rivers and harbors bill heretofore has contained some projects that laid the bills open to criticism, and that that necessarily makes it harder for legitimate projects to be considered and appropriated for by Congress. It makes it easier for sincere men to be honestly misled and join the general cry that the railroads are making against the improvements of the waterways of this country. I take it that no intelligent man—mind you, I say intelligent man—objects to a legitimate and proper improvement of the waterways of this country.

Two of the great natural waterways of the country are the Red River and the Arkansas. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] just stated that the Arkansas River was on a par with the Trinity River. Evidently the gentleman does not know anything about the Arkansas River. If the Trinity River is what he says it is, it would take a dozen Trinity Rivers to equal either the Red or the Arkansas.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. It is not a question of water, it is a question, rather, of navigability. The Red River is not navigable——

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield. I thought the gentleman wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. For a question.

Mr. EDWARDS. Is the gentleman of the opinion that the fight against the rivers and harbors bill and improvements in the country has been inaugurated by the railroads?

Mr. WINGO. I will not express myself further on that question now. Now, answering the remark of the gentleman from Texas as to the question of navigation, there can be no question about the Arkansas or the Red Rivers. The gentleman says Red River is not navigable. It has been navigable, and it is navigable now to a certain extent, and there is no question but that it can be made fully navigable by an expenditure of $140,000. The only thing to-day, the engineers say, that impedes legitimate navigation are the snags and logs, which can be taken out at an expense of $140,000, which they recommend should be appropriated for the purpose. The boats that have been navigating the river and carrying the commerce are tied up at the wharves because they can not navigate and because the work has failed. If you fail to carry out the recommendation of the engineers and make this appropriation of $140,000 to remove the snags and logs, you will kill what commerce there is left there.

Now, the gentleman from Texas says he can spit across the Trinity River, and yet he compares the Arkansas and Red Rivers with it. Evidently he has never seen either. It took nearly a million dollars to build a bridge across the Arkansas Rive. at Fort Smith. It would take a dozen Trinities to fill the Arkansas half bank full. Any man who goes through the Southwest knows that the Arkansas and the Red Rivers are in the same class as the Ohio River. I recognize that in the present alleged state of the finances you can not institute the project which the gentleman from Mississippi said the committee was considering of putting in on the Red River; but until you can, is it not good business judgment not to destroy what commerce is left, but give the engineers $140,000, which they estimate is necessary to keep the commerce going that is already upon that river?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I just want to call attention to the fact that the part of the Red River below Fulton, Ark., was voted on the other day. That is where the hundred thousand dollars was asked for. That has been disposed of. There are two projects. The one is above and the other below Fulton, Ark. The hundred thousand dollar item has already been stricken out. This is the $40,000 item above Fulton, Ark. The gentleman now attempts in one amendment to combine two separate projects. I call his attention to the fact that there is no commerce on the reach of the river that he asks this $40,000 for. Last year there were only 3,000 tons, and that was valued at only $16,000. We could not, of course, afford to appropriate $40,000 to maintain a channel that carries only $16,000 worth of commerce.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I know that there is commerce upon the river. I see it every day that I am at home. I see the boats tied up to the bridges at Red River, not simply at Fulton but at Index, and I know that staves out of my own county go over the Red River. The trouble is that many of them can not get out on account of the sand bar that is at the mouth of the Little River. The trouble with most of it is that the boats can not go out on account of snags. One boat I know is now tied up because the last trip she made she struck a snag.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. We appropriated to maintain this several years ago in the bill before the last, and $19,000 of that money is still left on hand with which to work along that reach of the river.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Did not the engineers estimate it would take $140,000 to do that work for the coming year?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, no.

Mr. WINGO. That is the report of the engineers that I have.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. But the gentleman takes the whole river.

Mr. WINGO. I take the whole river—$40,000 below and $100,000 above.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. We have already disposed of the $100,000 below Fulton.

Mr. WINGO. I am talking about the whole river.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; but for the part the gentleman's amendment applies to now there are $19,000 on hand with which to maintain the river, and that river carries only $16,000 worth of commerce.

Mr. WINGO. Then, why did the engineers estimate for $140,000?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cumberland River above Nashville, Tenn.: The balances remaining unexpended from the appropriations made for the construction of locks and dams heretofore authorized, and no longer needed for said purpose, are hereby made available for maintenance of improvement by open-channel work on that part of the river above Nashville.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors in bringing in this bill proposed a policy to the House with respect to the number of items and the amount of appropriations and authorizations that should be carried in the bill. That policy proposed to exclude all new projects of river and harbor improvements upon the ground that the stress of our revenue conditions, due to the foreign war, made the practice of rigid economy at this time very necessary. The committee, in pursuance of that policy, has excluded about 77 new projects that were carried in the last bill, which passed this House and failed of passage in the Senate during last year. Those projects were approved by the committee at that time. They were approved by the House with almost entire unanimity. They stand approved by the committee now just as much as they did when the bill passed the House last year, but, as the committee has explained, they were excluded from this bill not upon the question of merit, but solely upon the question of pressing economy. The people of Kentucky and Tennessee are greatly interested in a project, a new project it has been technically termed, relating to the upper Cumberland River, comprising a distance of almost 200 miles. In view of the fact that the committee has made the statement it has, and in view of the fact that it strongly expressed its approval of this project in its report accompanying the last river and harbor appropriation bill, but failed to embrace it in this bill for the reasons I have stated, I am not at all certain of the wisdom of proposing to the House now for its vote a new project embraced in this category. It would be voted on not upon its merits or demerits, but it would be voted down, as the Committee of the Whole has already expressed its approval of the policy proposed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors upon the ground that no new projects should be embraced in the bill. Under those circumstances I am not certain of the wisdom, as I say, of putting up a new project in the form of an amendment simply to be voted down without regard to its merits.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that there is no question in the mind of the River and Harbor Committee about the merits of the upper Cumberland River project. It was left out of the bill because of the financial condition of the country.

Mr. HULL. I have that decided understanding. Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, there have been some remarks made derogatory to this project by some gentlemen who evidently have not studied the facts, who have not read the facts. The record pertaining to this project comprises some three or four hundred pages, and I invite the closest scrutiny of every member of the House to every fact and phase of that record. Gentlemen, unintentionally no doubt, but in their hurry and lack of time to go into the entire facts of projects, have made statements that were as damaging as they were erroneous; and I hope that when this matter comes up in connection with the next river and harbor appropriation bill gentlemen who honestly desire to offer criticism will go into the record as they would the record of a lawsuit, and present their criticisms in the spirit of fairness and with a desire to assist the House in getting at the merits of the project. It is utterly impossible for gentlemen who seek——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to suggest to any gentleman the method by which he should offer criticisms or suggestions relative to the merits or demerits of a given item, but it does seem to me that it would be impossible for any gentleman to take up all of the items in any appropriation bill and be able to give the entire facts so as to present their merits to the committee.

The case of the upper Cumberland River is one in question. Gentlemen who have undertaken to present the facts have missed them entirely in every essential respect, and it is due to the method, evidently, of undertaking to offer criticisms or suggestions with respect to the merits of an item without taking the time necessary to investigate and assemble all the facts. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cumberland River below Nashville, Tenn.: Continuing improvement, $445,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 8 and 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 25, by striking out lines 8 and 9.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the Cumberland River, in my judgment, is as good as many of the projects in this bill—so far as we can judge. I desire to say in reference to what has been uttered by the gentleman from Tennessee who preceded me that in an effort to ascertain the facts in regard to this stream and all other streams Members have access only to the engineers' reports and to such statements as have been made by reputable men. Those I have relied upon, and the reputable men in this case are the men whose judgment on waterways, I believe, are equal to those of any men in this country. Now, to speak particularly to the preceding paragraph, on the upper Cumberland, without reference to the project before us on the lower river, the statistics in the engineers' report before us show that 84 per cent of all the traffic last year on the upper river consisted of sand and gravel or timber that floats. Naturally, that attracts attention. That is the information I have placed before the House, and the facts are that 84 per cent of all that traffic of sand, gravel, and timber, together with all traffic, has been aided to the extent of $3,000,000 already appropriated.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman is aware of the fact the value of the tonnage over the upper Cumberland was more than $8,000,000?

Mr. FREAR. I will speak to the point in a few minutes. Take the lower portion of the river. According to the engineers' report $835,439 was on hand last October and we are asked to appropriate $435,000 more, over a million dollars in all, in addition to $2,103,000 already appropriated on this branch of the river. We have appropriated $3,317,500 on the upper branch of the river. Now there is traffic upon this river for navigation at all seasons of the year.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I would prefer to get through with this statement, but I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. There was on hand the 1st of November last only $31,000.

Mr. FREAR. That means, if that be true, that $800,000 was spent inside of two months.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; it means there was only $31,000 available.

Mr. FREAR. That means $800,000 was contracted for within that time. I was referring to the commerce upon the lower part of the river. I am not criticizing the project, but only referring to what the engineers' report shows. The commerce on the lower river in 1913 was 165,123 tons. Railway ties and timber that floats composed 131,891 tons. Sand hauled 6 miles amounted to 11,250 tons, making a total of 143,141 tons, according to the engineers' report, which, deducted from the total of 165,123 tons, leaves a balance of 21,982 tons. In reply to the gentleman from Tennessee on this point as to the value of the commerce, I call attention to valuations of merchandise as put upon all these streams, which in the Tennessee, Kentucky, and many other streams, is averaged at $150 a ton, irrespective of actual value. The engineers have increased the rate for Tennessee; it may be worth that average amount, and, of course, it is difficult to get at the facts, as there are few statistics of any value in a proceeding of that kind, but taking the engineers' reports as they come before us from Shrewsbury, N. J., I want to call attention to this class of case——

Mr. HULL. I did not undertake to go into a discussion of the details of this matter, because it is not before the House.

Mr. FREAR. I suggest this is the point. At Shrewsbury——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FREAR. May I have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FREAR. This is on the point of how the engineers get at the data. At Shrewsbury, N. J., they had 1,306,188 tons in 1913, and, by the engineers' report of that amount, general merchandise 620,000 tons. Will the committee give attention for a moment to this point? At Shrewsbury there was 620,000 tons of merchandise, reported valued at $800,000; that is at the rate of $1.20 a ton. In Tennessee we have $1.50 gross value in every case.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman does not want to be incorrect, I know. I have not the details of the report of the upper river, but the value of the sand, to which the gentleman referred, was $51,000, while the value of manufactured articles alone was about $3,500,000.

Mr. FREAR. I am referring to "merchandise," and I call attention to the fact of the engineers' computation, and I do not want to misstate it in any way. General merchandise at Shrewsbury, N. J., is worth $1.20 a ton, according to the engineers' report. It must be of a better class of merchandise in Tennessee, where it is valued at $150, more than a hundred times as much a ton. Transportation of 500,000 tons of miscellaneous commerce, and that traffic is valued at $501,000, or practically $1 a ton.

Now, the engineers do not give us sufficient data, but these are the facts according to their reports. Sand hauled 6 miles on the lower Cumberland, and railroad ties and timber that float do not require a great depth of water. One hundred and thirty-one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one tons is included in these two items, or practically four-fifths or five-sixths of all the commerce on the river, leaving a balance of 21,000 tons of higher class freight.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. POWERS. I would like to have the gentleman make it 10 minutes. I would like 5 minutes myself.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will three minutes do? The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] says that three minutes will satisfy him, and if three minutes will satisfy the gentleman from Kentucky, I will ask that debate close in six minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in six minutes, the gentleman from Florida to consume three minutes and the gentleman from Kentucky three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to take only a moment or two of the committee's time for the purpose of referring to some of the statements made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] with reference to the commerce upon the lower Cumberland River. The gentleman's statements made upon the floor with reference to the commerce on the entire Cumberland River are to my mind an evidence of the inaccuracy of many of the statements the gentleman has made during the past few days relative to this bill. I have some personal knowledge of the commerce that is carried upon the lower Cumberland River. I am sure the gentleman intends to be accurate, but it simply shows how much in error a gentleman can be when he relies merely upon a few figures without investigating and reading all of the reports and securing all the information obtainable.

Now, the gentleman refers to commerce on the lower Cumberland River, and states, I think, that 85 per cent of it consisted of railroad ties and sand.

Mr. FREAR. I said 84 per cent on the upper river.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I misunderstood the gentleman. But he is wrong about that, for the report shows that of the $7,250,000 of commerce on the upper Cumberland River only about $300,000 was railroad ties and sand. As a matter of fact, the entire amount of forest products was about $2,000,000. The rest was farm products and merchandise. I am speaking now of the lower Cumberland River, however. The gentleman did not refer to the fact, Mr. Chairman, that the commerce upon the lower Cumberland River not only consisted in a large part of logs, lumber, railroad ties, handles, slabs, and spokes, but there were 3,200 hogsheads of tobacco transported on this river during the year, and nearly 300,000 bushels of corn, wheat, and all other kinds of agricultural products, large quantities of live stock, and great and valuable quantities of manufactured products and general merchandise, as set forth in the report of the engineers. Now, in addition to that, Mr. Chairman, the report of the engineer shows that upon the lower Cumberland River, where only one lock and dam has been completed up to this time, there has been a reduction of freight rates by reason of the building of that lock and dam of from 18 to 26 cents per hundred pounds to 6 to 12 cents per hundred pounds, a most important and material fact to be considered.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. And the gentleman might add that this great amount of commerce is transported on the river where there is only about four months' average navigation a year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true. And that is an indication of what the increase in commerce will be if this river is completely locked and dammed.

And the gentleman was also inaccurate, as was shown by the chairman of the committee a moment ago, when he said there was over $800,000 on hand to the credit of the lower Cumberland River. There was $31,000 on hand, and the district engineer has reported that it is necessary to appropriate this $445,000 in order to complete the three locks and dams which are now under way. As was stated by the chairman, this work is being done under contract, and the gentleman from Wisconsin in his consideration of this matter has failed to take into account that there are contracts now under way down there which must be provided for in this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin does not want to be unfair to the upper Cumberland River. He does not understand the situation. There is a scope of territory upon the upper Cumberland River of about 100 miles where they have no locks and dams. There is one lock and dam in the upper Cumberland River 30 miles below Burnside, and others then lower down. For the reason that there is a strip of territory on the upper Cumberland River not connected by locks and dams, the commerce in the upper Cumberland River is not as large as it would be if you had navigation the whole year around. There is a tract of country there as big as the entire State of Connecticut that has not a foot of railroad within its entire boundary lines. And it is a country that has produced some of the great men of our country. Senator Shelby M. Cullom, of the State of Illinois, was born in Monticello, Ky.—there in this scope of territory. It has furnished two governors of the State of Kentucky, Gov. Bramlette and Gov. Leslie. Gov. Benton McMillin, of Tennessee, was born in one of those counties down there. It is rich in timber and in coal. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] says that the value of its commerce amounts to but little.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no; I beg pardon.

Mr. POWERS. To say the least of it, that it does not amount to very much in proportion to the moneys intended to be expended on that stream. He must remember that coal operators will not put up mining plants to get out coal when you can only get transportation facilities for some four months in the year. If this river was canalized, if you could transport over it the whole year around, the commerce on that stream would tell an entirely different story from that which the figures now show. It is a rich country and a valuable one in natural resources, but pitifully poor in transportation facilities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Tennessee River, Tenn., Ala., and Ky.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance by open-channel work as follows: Above Chattanooga, Tenn., $265,000; between Florence and Riverton, Ala., $120,000; below Riverton, Ala., $287,000: Provided, That any portion of the amount hereby or heretofore appropriated for any section of said river may, upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, be transferred by the Secretary of War and made available for improvement in any other section of said river.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire this for two purposes—one, to make corrections in the statements that have been made. I admit that I have not a personal knowledge of many of the projects, nor do I pretend to have.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a unanimous consent? How much times does the gentleman wish?

Mr. FREAR. Seven minutes. I want to answer the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] as to statistics only. I want my regular five minutes and then two minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in seven minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. What is the request of the chairman of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The request is that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto end in seven minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I want some time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think presently we will reach something else, when all these gentlemen will have an opportunity of talking.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] have five minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee want?

Mr. MANN. He would like to have five minutes.

Mr. LIEB. Can I get five minutes?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Make it 17 minutes, Mr. Chairman; 7 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LIEB], and 5 to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 17 minutes, 7 minutes to be given to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LIEB], and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to encroach on the time of the committee and will not take the full seven minutes if I can answer fully the statements that have been made with reference to the Cumberland and Tennessee Rivers in a shorter time.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, I was corrected a moment ago on the floor by a Member who is supposed to know the conditions around a river in his own State. As I understood him to say, navigation is possible only for a few months on the lower branch of that river. Let me read the engineer's report, in which it states that the Cumberland River below Nashville is navigable for all boats six months in the year. For boats drawing 8 feet of water it is navigable for four months in the year. It is navigable for small steamboats throughout the year. I suggested that five-sixths of all that commerce consisted of railway ties and sand and timber, carried 6 miles—things that could be hauled at that stage of water. I think I was fair in my statement. I do not want to misstate.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. FREAR. I can not be interrupted unless I get more time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I notice the gentleman has mentioned several times, in criticism of the commerce on that stream, that it was only sand.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; and it was hauled only 6 miles.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Has the gentleman any particular antipathy for sand? I think it is about as good a class of commerce as you can carry.

Mr. MANN. If there were more sand in the House it would be a good thing. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. The chairman has held us down to 17 minutes on a $682,000 item. I want to get some of the facts in my possession into the RECORD, even if I can not get them before the House. I say a large portion of the commerce is sand, which is hauled 6 miles, and the river now offers a sufficient stage of water for all practical purposes throughout the year, according to the engineer's report. Now, the gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MOON. Just for a question.

Mr. FREAR. I can not yield to the gentleman at this time unless I get more time, Mr. Chairman. I want to be as courteous as possible to the gentleman, but I am tied down as to time, and I want to answer the gentleman as to a former statement.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman was talking to my colleague [Mr. HULL].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], the other day, followed me on this floor and criticized me very severely. The gentleman from Tennessee did that apparently because I stated what was shown in the record upon Muscle Shoals, that between five and six thousand tons is all the traffic that goes through at this port, according to the engineer's report in 1912 and in 1913. He said the traffic was $13,000,000 in value and 1,300,000 tons. Is not that right?

Mr. MOON. No.

Mr. FREAR. So the RECORD shows, I believe. I want the gentleman to read the RECORD. I have the RECORD right here.

Mr. MOON. Let the gentleman be composed for a moment and I will show him where the mistake is. It is $23,000,000 instead of $13,000,000.

Mr. FREAR. I am glad the gentleman has made the correction.

Mr. MOON. No; you are not glad.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I am glad. I want the House to know what the commerce is on that stream. But here is the engineers' report. It says the total above Chattanooga was 469,685 tons. From Chattanooga to Florence it was 104,133 tons. From Florence to Paducah, Ky., it was 186,000 tons. The total, including duplications, all told, is 1,053,923 tons—not a very great difference I will concede.

But, Mr. Chairman, of that total, sand and gravel made up 555,000 tons hauled 6 miles, and logs and timber that floats or is barged amounted to 523,000 tons, leaving a balance of 275,923 tons, which is reasonably large. But of that amount, 145,000 tons transported was iron ore, valued at $1.20 per ton, reducing 1,300,000 tons, valued at $13,000,000, to 126,923 tons, with the exception stated, according to the engineer's report. That is the report of the engineers, and when I was criticizing the other day the advisability of putting $18,000,000 more into Muscle Shoals, to carry between five and six thousand tons through the canal at that point, criticism was made in reply that I did not know about the river. Here are the facts according to the reports of the engineers as to the rest of the traffic. If they are true, they can not be controverted. The expenditure has already amounted to $8,658,000 on that river, as I find it in the engineers' report.

Mr. MOON. How much did the gentleman say?

Mr. FREAR. Eight million six hundred and fifty-eight thousand dollars, including locks and canals.

Mr. MOON. Oh, there has been $10,000,000 recently expended in one place alone.

Mr. FREAR. Then I accept the amendment.

Mr. MOON. That was expended by individuals, however.

Mr. FREAR. This $8,658,000 was Government money. I have no desire, Mr. Chairman, to misrepresent in any case, but I give you the facts as they are shown by the engineers' reports. I gave you the facts before as to what the engineers say of the navigability of the Cumberland River—navigable for 12 months in the year, as shown above Chattanooga. I did not move to strike out the item.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MOON. How much did you say the engineers' report showed above Chattanooga? How many tons?

Mr. FREAR. Four hundred and sixty-nine thousand six hundred and eighty-five tons. You will find it on page 2562.

Mr. MOON. Of a value of——

Mr. FREAR. I am leaving out the valuation.

Mr. MOON. I am going to give you the valuation. You very carefully dodged that.

Mr. FREAR. Ask me another question, and see if I have given you the correct figures.

Mr. MOON. What did you say the valuation was?

Mr. FREAR. I did not give you the valuation.

Mr. MOON. I am going to give you that. It is $2,207,763.

Mr. FREAR. I say that the valuation in New Jersey of "merchandise" is put at $1.20 per ton and in Tennessee merchandise is valued at $1.50 per ton by the engineers, and I am showing the value of that method of securing statistics.

Mr. MOON. From Chattanooga to Browns Island, how much have you?

Mr. FREAR. I have given it from Chattanooga to Florence at 104,733 tons. That is the figure given in the report, page 2572.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman allow me two minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LIEB] has five minutes.

Mr. MOON. I just want to say before the gentleman from Indiana begins——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield me one minute?

Mr. LIEB. I do not want this to come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LIEB. I want to quote from page 1708 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 16, 1914, about 20 lines down in the first column, from the statement of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. He said:

> Mr. Chairman, I will say to him that if anyone on this floor makes a misstatement, either purposely or by mistake, the attention of the House ought to be called to it, and conclusions will then be drawn.

The gentleman also said:

> There is no dispute about the statistics I quoted here, because they came from the engineer's report. I do not desire to misrepresent in a single case.

Mr. FREAR. I repeat that statement. I do not want to misrepresent in a single instance.

Mr. LIEB. The gentleman has signified his willingness to make nothing but truthful statements. I charge the gentleman with making a statement here which is injurious and damaging to this item in the bill. I want to quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 14. The gentleman in his speech said:

> The Ohio River received $4,176,000 in the sundry civil bill and asked for $5,000,000 more in the defeated 1914 "pork barrel," or $9,176,000 in one year for its $64,000,000 canalization scheme.

Now, I charge that the gentleman has misrepresented the facts, and the statement he has made here is damaging to this item in the bill. I refer to the sundry civil bill of 1914, known as H. R. 17041, and my statement that of the amount carried there the sum of $1,976,000 was authorized by Congress in 1911. Another item to the amount of $2,200,000 was authorized by Congress in 1912. Yet the gentleman comes on this floor and says that the whole amount was in what he calls that "pork-barrel" bill.

Mr. FREAR rose.

Mr. LIEB. No; I will not yield. Those two items were acted upon by Congress in 1911 and 1912. Yet the gentleman comes up here and signifies his willingness to tell nothing but the truth.

Mr. FREAR rose.

Mr. LIEB. I will not yield. I would like to refer to other items.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LIEB. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been limited. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the discussion on this bill, and I wish to enter a protest against the language used by Members in criticism of it on both sides of the Chamber. I am proud of the fact that I am a Member of this great lawmaking body. When we think that out of a hundred million people 435 are chosen here, it is a great honor to all of us. I have not only a pride in my membership in this House, but I have great interest, consideration, and respect for all my colleagues. And I want to appeal to them to conduct themselves in the discharge of their official duties here so as to elevate the standard of the membership of this great body.

I know that the chairman of this committee [Mr. SPARKMAN] has been a faithful and honorable Member of this House for over 20 years. He comes from a district with a population of more than 250,000 people. These harsh and unjust reflections upon him and the other members of the Rivers and Harbors Committee are unworthy of any man who is entitled to a seat in this great body. These Members have as great a care for the observance of their oath of office as their critics. They have only a conscientious and patriotic purpose to observe that oath in the faithful discharge of their duties on the committee and as Members of this House.

There are many of our constituents who read in the muck-raking magazines and newspapers the unkind and unjust utterances made here against the membership of this House and against this great committee. We are furnishing material for these papers to discredit us and to lower the standard and dignity of this great body, and I appeal to my colleagues, if you must have a reputation in this House as public servants, I pray you do not secure it by methods of this kind, reflecting upon the integrity and the official honor of such men as compose the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

If we want the country to respect us as a body, we must respect each other. If we want the public press to approve the administration of this House and the conduct of its Members, let us be careful in our criticisms of each other. We are supposed to be men of standing, of character, and of honor, or our constituents would not single us out and send us here. I think they would not have retained the faithful chairman of the committee as their Representative for 20 long years if his conduct in and out of office did not testify to his high standing and credit as a man and as a public official. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Tennessee River between Browns Island and the railroad bridge below the city of Florence, Ala.: For the completion of the detailed surveys, foundation borings, and preparation of plans for the improvement of this section of the river for the purposes of navigation, combined with the development of water power by the United States alone or in cooperation with private interests, $150,000: Provided, That the work hereby authorized is understood to be of a preliminary nature only and in extension of investigations heretofore authorized, and that the United States is in no wise committed to the execution of any plan of improvement which may be contemplated or proposed without the further and express action of Congress.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph. This paragraph provides for not only the purposes of navigation, but for the development of water power by the United States alone or in cooperation with private interests. Of course it is preliminary in reference to this work. I think under the law applying to surveys this is not authorized in the rivers and harbors appropriation bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not know of any rule that sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois. He does not make the point of order on the ground that it is new legislation. He does not make the point of order that an item of this kind is not in order on a river and harbor bill. I fail to see wherein this item is in conflict with the rules of the House, and therefore it is difficult to direct an argument against the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. It is new legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It can not be contended that it is new legislation on an appropriation bill, because this is not an appropriation bill, and the rule in relation to appropriation bills does not apply. This legislation is authorization in a river and harbor bill, and there is no other place in which the authorization of a survey can be made except on this bill.

Although I do not see how the Chairman can sustain the point of order that is made by the gentleman from Illinois, I think I can state to the Chair why this particular project is in order on this bill. I desire to call to the attention of the Chair the fact that this particular point in the Tennessee River has been under improvement by the Government since 1828 in one way or another; that more than two decades ago the Government entered upon an improvement on this particular part of the river known as Muscle Shoals. In doing so it partly completed a lateral canal at this point; but the terminals or approaches to the canal not being completed, and requiring some seven or eight million dollars to fully complete the project, the Congress itself stopped further work on the project and ordered a new survey to ascertain whether or not the removal of the obstructions to navigation in the river at this point could not be accomplished more feasibly by a new project rather than to complete the old project.

That survey has been continued over a period of eight years. There has been some criticism made of the project because there is a very small tonnage that has gone through the canal. Naturally it could not go through the canal when both of the entrances to the canal have been stopped up during low water on the river. The only tonnage that can go through at this time is in boats that go through in high water. That limitation in going through the canal has been brought about by the fact that the Government did not complete its original project and improve the entrances to the canal so that they could be used at low as well as at high water.

The Congress ordered the engineers of the United States Government to report to the Congress as to whether or not it was practicable and feasible to construct a lock and dam system at Muscle Shoals that would produce both navigation and hydroelectric power. That report is nearly completed; in all the details except one it is completed. The one point of information yet to be ascertained is in regard to the foundations for the dams, and the item now under consideration provides for a complete investigation in respect to them.

The report of the United States Engineers, printed in Document No. 20, Sixty-third Congress, second session, on the Muscle Shoals project in the Tennessee River, shows:

Appropriation for Muscle Shoals.

Appropriations for construction of Muscle Shoals Canal from 1828 to Oct. 1, 1914	$3,191,726.50
Appropriations for operation and maintenance of Muscle Shoals Canal since 1890 to Oct. 1, 1914	1,368,247.79
Total	4,559,974.49
Average operating and maintenance cost per annum since 1890 to 1914, inclusive, of Muscle Shoals Canal	54,729.91
Estimated annual cost of lock and dam project recommended by engineers in Document No. 20	25,000.00
Annual saving to Government of lock and dam project proposed by engineers in Document No. 20, compared with present canal cost of operation	29,729.51

Financial plan of new project recommended by United States Engineers in Document No. 20:

ESTIMATED INVESTMENT OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.

United States Engineers' estimate of cost of project, exclusive of equipment and power houses	$18,701,000
Power company contribution	3,000,000
	15,701,000
Total amount chargeable to navigation, as estimated by United States Engineers	8,575,000
Investment of Federal Government chargeable to power, as estimated by United States Engineers	7,126,000
Total	15,701,000
Estimated initial expenditure of power company:
Power houses and equipment	6,887,800
Contribution to Federal Government	3,000,000
Total initial expenditure	9,887,800
Estimated ultimate expenditure of the power company:
Complete plants, with connecting lines	39,492,300
Contribution to Federal Government	3,000,000
Total	42,492,300

Contributions proposed by power company, as stated by United States Engineers in Document No. 20:

Total paid on $7,126,000 by power company in annual contribution in 100 years	$26,285,000

The United States Engineer Special Board in the course of its report contained in Document No. 20 states the following:

It is believed, therefore, that it may reasonably be assumed that the initial payment of $3,000,000, with the 99 annual payments, will return the entire part of the cost chargeable to power development with compound interest at 3 per cent. The actual aggregate amount paid by the company by the initial payment and the 99 annual payments will be $26,285,000.

In addition to the above return to the Government for power development, it is estimated that the lowest amount the Government will receive to reimburse it for amount expended for navigation development in 100 years under the proposed contract at 35 cents per horsepower per year, with an average of $155,750, will be $15,575,000.

The report demonstrates, if your engineers can be relied upon, that at the end of the 100 years the Government will have its money paid back with reasonable interest and a continuing net income from the investment.

I wish to answer the criticism made as to the tonnage going through the canal, so that I may not have to do it later.

It is true the average tonnage going through the canal has not amounted to more than 11,800 tons, because you have not finished your project. You put a cork in the mouth of the bottle, and as long as you keep a cork there nothing can go through except in high water. These Muscle Shoals are near Florence, Ala. From Florence through to the Ohio River there is an average in the last 20 years of 617,000 tons a year. From Florence, above the canal, to Chattanooga there has been an average of 206,000 tons. From Chattanooga to Knoxville, 384,000 tons; and above Knoxville, on the tributaries above, 36,400 tons, showing an average of freight carried on this river, with a cork put in the bottle about midway between the head of navigation and the mouth of the river, dammed up right in the middle of it, an average tonnage in the last 22 years of 1,255,200 tons a year.

The tonnage is there to-day. It would vastly increase if you give it an opportunity to get out to the sea, but you can not do so until you complete the project. Now, the engineers in this report show that it is possible to complete the two great dams at this point and create a horsepower that is equal to that which is now available at Niagara Falls.

I do not mean to say the entire horsepower that could be developed at Niagara, because that is vaster than anything we have in this country; but because of limitation of power development by Congress and the act of the Canadian Government. The power at Niagara Falls, I understand, is limited to 450,000 horsepower, and the engineer's report shows that if you build these dams at Muscle Shoals you can create a horsepower at this point equal to that of Niagara.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman has struck a point which I think he should elucidate, and that is whether questions of water power come within the purview of a river and harbor bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am coming to that point.

Mr. MOORE. It is a big question, and the gentleman could help us very much if he would give his views.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course that is not germane to this proposition, but I do believe that a great many of these inland rivers can be developed by private capital, so far as navigation is concerned, if you give the private capital an opportunity to sell the horsepower at reasonable rates, and I believe that is an economic and practicable way in which to develop navigation.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman not admit that this is primarily a water-power proposition?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I will not.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman know that the Board of Engineers so state?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They may so state in their report that the water power in this proposition is of more value than the navigation, but I call to the gentleman's attention this fact, Here is a river that has a drainage area in nine States. It has a number of large cities upon it. It goes through a territory where there is an opportunity for wonderful mineral development. A great deal of the beauxite ores that are carried to Canada to be manufactured into aluminum come from the territory on this river. Right adjacent to this very dam are the iron fields, and an electric power here would develop electrical steel more advantageously than at any place in the United States. Therefore the engineers may well say that this project is of more value as a power development than a river development. But can the gentleman say that a river that carries to the sea more water in its drainage area than does the Ohio River, where the two rivers flow together, that flows through one of the most fertile areas of country in the United States, is to be ignored as a navigation proposition simply because there may be great power development upon it?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. On the gentleman's theory, would not every dam bill go to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors rather than to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course it could go to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The question of jurisdiction between the two committees is a question for this House to decide ultimately.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman think that a particular proposition receives the same consideration upon its merits when embodied in the river and harbor bill that it does when considered as a separate proposition?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I say that it ought to. I do not know whether it does or not. I am not trying to prevent the proposition receiving careful consideration at this time.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, is it not a fact that the Keokuk proposition was carried in a river and harbor appropriations bill, and the Hales Bar proposition, 30 miles below Chattanooga, also carried in a river and harbor appropriation bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think so. But I wish to call to the attention of the House that here is a proposition that this House must face, in justice to these people, either as a river and harbor appropriation proposition or as a power proposition, or as both. This river would be open to navigation to-day if it had not been for the fact that the Alabama delegation stopped its efforts to complete the present improvement because the Government engineers advised that this proposition be further examined into as to whether a development could not be better made by the development of power and navigation both at the same time. I say the Alabama delegation, but I mean the delegation from Alabama, Tennessee, and the other delegations interested. The question that confronts the House is this: After eight years of examination the engineers report to the Congress a project which they say can be developed in a particular way. I am not here to argue the merits or the demerits of that proposition, to argue the question as to whether the Congress ought to accept it or ought not to accept it at this time and in this bill. That is not the question before the House. Before that question can come before the House there is one other fact that must be ascertained, and that is as to whether or not there is a foundation in the river on which this great dam could rest.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to finish my statement.

Mr. LENROOT. I know the gentleman wishes to be accurate, but does not the gentleman know that the Board of Engineers have reported absolutely upon that question, and have also reported that no further surveys are needed for the information of Congress?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not so understand.

Mr. LENROOT. I hold it in my hand.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman would read up, he would find that what they are making the surveys for now is to determine in reference to the water-power project.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. Nothing more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They are asking this survey to ascertain whether or not there is a foundation on which this dam can rest, because if the foundation is not there that will sustain this dam, then you must abandon the power project and you must go back to complete the present project that is there to-day and finish the approaches to the canal that is already built.

But if, when you make these borings, it is ascertained that there is a foundation there which will sustain this dam, then you can take up at the next Congress or at such time as the proper committee may see fit to bring it before the House, the question as to whether you are going to develop this proposition as a navigation and a power proposition put together, or whether you are going to abandon the power proposition entirely and merely develop it as a river and harbor improvement solely. Now, that is the question, and, I say, Mr. Chairman, this appropriation is simply a continuation of a survey that has already been made to ascertain a material fact, the question as to whether there is a foundation there, which can only be ascertained by boring, or whether it is not a fact, and that is just as important a part of this survey to give this information to Congress as any other fact contained in the report. This survey has been carried in this bill. It comes under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. In no way do I desire the committee and the House to agree to one proposition or the other at this time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Alabama has talked a little over 15 minutes without asking consent of the committee, and that he objected to my asking for 20 minutes on a matter which is of more importance to Chicago than this is to Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; the gentleman from Illinois is my good friend and has been for many years.

Mr. MADDEN. I have no objection to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me to answer him, there is no man in the House for whom I am more anxious to grant a courtesy than the gentleman from Illinois, and have always shown that I am. The gentleman from Illinois asked this morning something that was impossible to agree to, and I stated when I was on the floor that if the gentleman would wait until we got into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union that he could get reasonable time; but I did object to his asking for an order made in the House in reference to debate in the committee, and I was very sorry after my explanation of that fact to the gentleman from Illinois that he saw proper to demand that a quorum should be present.

Mr. MADDEN. Then the gentleman said that I would not get any time later on. Notwithstanding that——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say this——

Mr. MADDEN. Notwithstanding that I have not objected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not subject to objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes; it is. The gentleman has talked on the merits of the question for 15 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course some discussion was to the merits; the gentleman is correct; but I was talking on the point of order. If I said to the gentleman this morning that he should not have time, of course my objection might stop it; but I never have exercised my right of objection to interfere with a Member of this House doing what was legitimate for the interests of his constituents; and if I said that to the gentleman this morning I withdraw it as long as the gentleman stands here in the interest of his district and does not filibuster, which I do not charge the gentleman with doing, except this morning when he forced the roll call.

Mr. MADDEN. There were only about 25 Members in the House, and I knew there was very important business to be transacted, and I thought it necessary to have the Members here to hear what was going on.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy further time of the committee except to insist that this proposition is primarily a navigation question, and the development of power is an incident to the development of navigation in the river. If it were not, the Congress would not have jurisdiction of the matter at all. There is a canal at Muscle Shoals now that is not completed, and until this survey is completed how can the Congress determine whether it will appropriate the money to complete the present canal or whether it will abandon the present canal and adopt the report of the engineers as to the new proposal?

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman has stated a number of times that the present project has not been completed. He stated once that the Alabama delegation had prevented the completion of the project——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I did not say that they prevented it, but I said they did not insist on it.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman stated the present project has not been completed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It has not.

Mr. LENROOT. This year's report from the engineers states, "Improvement of the stretch of the river from the head of Browns Island to Florence, Ala., has been completed under the existing project."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How can it be completed when there are only a few months in the year when the water can go over the sills of the approaches at either end of the canal?

Mr. LENROOT. But they have completed the project authorized by Congress; that is the point.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They have completed the project as far as they were authorized to do so by Congress, but they have got a lateral canal into the belly of Muscle Shoals which you can not get into except at high water. Does the gentleman say that a project is completed when you can not enter it at either end except at high water?

Mr. LENROOT. What the gentleman had in mind was that the gentleman from Alabama was mistaken in saying there is an incomplete project as authorized by Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I said the project was incomplete; I did not say anything about the authorization of Congress.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to say a word. In my judgment, and from all I can get, this is simply a project for the purpose of the development of water power, and that it is simply another attempt of the company that is operating a number of plants on the part of the United States——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER (continuing). To secure another one at some future time. It is, then, for the purpose of developing water power and not for navigation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I wanted simply to ask the gentleman whether he was going to discuss the point of order. If not, can we not agree to some time?

Mr. FOSTER. I had finished, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield? How does the gentleman interpret this language on lines 3 and 4 of page 26:

That the work hereby authorized is understood to be of a preliminary nature only.

Does not that indicate that this is new work?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is for that purpose.

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentleman will yield, as I remember it, it cost $10,000 to find out by borings if there was a foundation for the Seattle dry dock at the Bremerton Navy Yard, a great big proposition. Does not the gentleman think that an appropriation of that $150,000 is a big appropriation for digging a few holes down there?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is beyond the point of order. I hope the gentleman will confine himself to the point of order in answering questions.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall endeavor to do so.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from Tennessee on the merits of the proposition.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], as I understand him, makes the point of order that the committee is without jurisdiction to report an appropriation for the purpose of determining whether water power should be developed by the United States alone or in cooperation with private interests in connection with a project for navigation. Now, it is pretty generally understood and believed that the power of Congress over a navigable stream extends to the control of its waters for the purpose of navigation. If there were anything in the position as taken by the gentleman from Illinois, to begin with it would have to be assumed as true upon his part that this contention as to the power of Congress over navigable streams is correct. Listen to the language of this section:

Tennessee River, between Browns Island and the railroad bridge below the city of Florence, Ala: For the completion of the detailed surveys, foundation borings, and preparation of plans for the improvement of this section of the river for the purposes of navigation—

If the sentence stopped there, there is not an intelligent man in this House who would question for one second the power and the jurisdiction of Congress. It continues:

Combined with the development of water power by the United States alone, or in cooperation with private interests, $150,000.

Now, to understand and appreciate the position taken by the gentleman as to the point of order we would have to understand something about the facts. Those facts are judicially known to the Chair, for he sits as a quasi judicial officer on this matter. It is a well-known fact that the Tennessee River—and I have a right to state in connection with the consideration of this matter those facts that are judicially known to the Chair—it is a well-known fact, as stated by the gentleman from Alabama, that this improvement has been going on for some eighty and odd years. The river is opened up to navigation below the Muscle Shoals, and that is the point in contention here. It is open in pools at various points above the Muscle Shoals. Nevertheless, when we have completed the project of $6,700,000, upon which $2,000,000 or more have already been expended, that river will be a completed river for the purposes of navigation except the Muscle Shoals section, the very part of the river that is involved in this appropriation.

It has been deemed advisable to complete the river in other places and wait for the final determination or completion of this stream by the improvement of the Muscle Shoals section. But that has been the subject of legislation here and of action on the part of engineers in pursuance of legislation during all of this period of time. It has never been abandoned. The question of the survey, the question of the borings, the question of ascertaining the foundations for a lock and a dam for the purpose of navigation have been pending all the time, and are now pending. This river, unless this work is done, can never be completed. You will note now that there is a lateral canal around the shoals which can not be reached except at a rather high stage of water. That canal has cost $9,000,000, and it has to be improved. The question is whether it is best to continue this long, tortuous, and devious route and slow method of transportation or whether it is better for the Government of the United States to adopt a system of locks and dams instead of a United States canal. Well, if it is wise for the Government to adopt a system of locks and dams, it certainly will not be questioned that it already has the power to do so under the Constitution and in view of the facts. Then, if it has the power to do these things, if it is in order to complete a lock and dam, detailed surveys and foundation borings and preparation of plans for the improvement of the river must be made; then who shall say that the Government may not, in making these plans and preparations that are entirely essential for the exercise of this power and the jurisdiction in the promotion of navigation, ascertain that lateral fact, if I may so speak, as to whether water power might be developed here by the United States alone or in cooperation with others? Suppose the Government, after it has erected its locks and dams, saw fit to operate those locks and dams by electric power. Who will say that the power does not belong to the Congress to ascertain whether the conditions there are such that will enable the Government to use electric power in the operation of its machinery and its canal?

If there was nothing more in this question than that, or whether the Government should have the right to participate and join in for the purpose of securing this right with the riparian owners, it is a difficulty that is a serious one. Suppose the Government should go in there and state that this is a proper place for improvement of navigation, that it is the cheapest and best thing to be done, and that we need these things to be done; that we want to erect a lock and dam—they can do that in the river—but in the same connection we want to use electrical power for the operation of these locks and dams. What has to be done? The riparian owner has to be consulted. You have to secure the site on dry land and not on water for the location of the machinery necessary for this purpose. Perhaps the State may have to be consulted in some instances.

Then shall it be said that Congress is without power, that in carrying out and in furtherance of a constitutional right and duty for the improvement of the country it shall be without power to engage with the riparian owner or with a Commonwealth of the Union as to those necessary things that will enable the Congress to carry out the provisions of the Constitution and fully exercise the powers which it has for the promotion of navigation?

I think the discussion of these necessary and incidental things in connection with the question involved leaves it clear that the jurisdiction exists in this committee. While I am not prepared now to discuss that question—and it is not essential to do so—I am not prepared to yield to the proposition that the Congress of the United States upon its navigable rivers has not the right to build locks and dams not only for the purpose of navigation but for the ultimate purpose of developing power.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a word to say on the point of order merely.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss the point of order for a few moments myself, but I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR] is recognized.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object, but unless the discussion hereafter is confined to the point of order—the discussion heretofore having been on the merits largely—I shall ask unanimous consent myself to speak for 15 minutes on the merits of this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes the discussion will be confined to the point of order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak a few words, because I shall speak strictly to the point of order and prevent, if I can, such propositions as have been interjected on the merits, because discussion of the merits on a point of order takes too much time, is wholly unnecessary, and everybody knows the question will be fully discussed on its merits at the proper time. The law governing this question is contained in section 3 of the river and harbor act of 1913. I will read so much of it as bears upon the proposition:

SEC. 3. That in all cases where preliminary examinations and surveys are authorized, a preliminary examination of the river, harbor, or the proposed improvement mentioned shall first be made and a report as to the advisability of its improvement shall be submitted, unless a survey or estimate is expressly directed. If, upon such preliminary examination, the proposed improvement is not deemed advisable, no further action shall be taken thereon without the further direction of Congress; but in case the report shall be favorable to such proposed improvement, or that a survey and estimate should be made to determine the advisability of the improvement, the Secretary of War is authorized in his discretion to cause surveys to be made and the cost and advisability to be reported to the Congress.

There have been several preliminary examinations referred to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors and probably two or three surveys on improvement of Muscle Shoals since the report of January 11, 1909, as set forth in Document No. 20 of the present session of Congress, page 2. I think that the first authorization for the board of review was passed in the river and harbor act of 1902. Nothing has been finally reported that I remember to Congress upon that proposition, and in 1910 the preliminary examinations which the engineers were required to make were still unfinished, still in preliminary condition.

That report was still unfinished, so that in 1912 the Secretary of War and the engineers were requested, under a resolution drawn by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to take the question up and consider all the various reports, and examine all the previous surveys and all previous action that had heretofore been had in regard to this section of the Tennessee River and report back to Congress as follows:

1. To allow, if desired, of an absolute elimination of any or all cooperation with any corporation in the work of improving the Muscle Shoals reach of the Tennessee River.

2. If any private proposition for this improvement is considered by the board, to report upon all which may be offered or secured, giving the estimate of the construction cost of each, having in view the preservation of all the water power that can be developed in this reach of the Tennessee River.

3. In estimating the water power which can be developed at the dams of such slack-water navigation, to take into consideration the annual flow of the river with its variation for the past 25 or 30 years if data can be had, so as to be able to report the minimum flow as well as the probable maximum flow of the river, and the probable amount of primary and secondary or other fluctuating power which can be developed.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the law of 1902 and the resolution of 1912, as the gentleman says, a review of the surveys of this portion of the Tennessee River was directed for the purpose of improving the river for navigation purposes; and did they also provide that the engineers should make a survey with reference to ascertaining what improvements could be made, combined with the question of water power?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Yes; as will be seen in the following language the answer is set out on page 2 of Document No. 20, presented at this session of Congress:

Resolved by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, United States, That the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, created under section 3 of the river and harbor act approved June 13, 1902, be, and it hereby is, requested to review its report of January 11, 1909, on the survey of the Muscle Shoals in the Tennessee River as submitted in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 14, Sixtieth Congress, second session, and to submit as soon as practicable a revised report and estimate of the cost of the construction of the necessary locks and dams for the improvement of said river and the development of water power in connection therewith as proposed by the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co., together with a detailed plan of cooperation between said company and the United States, such report and plan to state the equitable amount that the Government of the United States ought to contribute to such work.

Resolved by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, United States, That in lieu of the request made by committee resolution dated June 14, 1910, the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, created under section 3 of the river and harbor act approved June 13, 1902, be, and is hereby, requested to review all previous reports on the survey on that reach of the Tennessee River in the State of Alabama from Browns Island to the railroad bridge below the city of Florence, Ala., and to submit as soon as practicable a revised report and estimate of the cost of the necessary locks and dams for the improvement of said river for navigation and the development of water power in connection therewith, considering not only the case of no cooperation on the part of the United States with any corporation or water-power company whatsoever, but also the case of cooperation with any and all such companies; and to inquire into and report the probable amount and value of water power that can be developed in this reach of the Tennessee River under conditions of both minimum and maximum flow; and to take such steps as may be advisable, by advertising for bids or otherwise, to ascertain as definitely as practicable the fair value of the water power which can be developed, submitting estimates separately for each dam, and reporting also upon the probable cost of supplying foundations and other underwater facilities at each one of the locks and dams in connection therewith whereby power can be later generated and developed; all these investigations and reports to be made with a view to providing for an immediate slack-water navigation of 6 feet, capable of later deepening to 9 feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I should like to say one word further on that proposition, but I can say it later.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. I have no desire to discuss the merits and hope I may be able to confine myself entirely to the point of order.

Mr. CARLIN. Perhaps the gentleman did not understand the Chair. The Chair stated that he was ready to rule.

Mr. MOORE. The Chair has heard a number of gentlemen against the point of order, and I desire to be heard in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. Referring to the engineer's report, in order to ascertain just what the project is, I find this statement:

The canal—

I call the attention of the Chair to the language specifically—

The canal was operated, and the locks, canal trunk and embankments, shops and appliances, buildings and grounds, and floating plant were cared for and maintained during the year.

This is found on page 2583 of the engineer's report. The project, if we are to consider it as a project existing and not a new project, according to the description of the engineers, necessitates all sorts of work pertaining to the construction of a canal. There are locks and dams; there are canal trunks and embankments; there is a railway bed and a railway; there are shops and boat-building equipment; there is a sawmill, a carpenter shop, a machine shop, foundry, dry dock; and there are other facilities in connection with the project. In addition, there are buildings of one kind or another, and there are boat-building operations.

The dry dock—

Reports the engineer—was in use 221 days—

And so forth.

These are all accessories to the project, which is a canal project.

Now, on January 15 last the Committee of the Whole had under consideration a question somewhat similar to this, with the present Chairman occupying the chair. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offered an amendment providing for the taking over by the Government of a canal for the purposes of navigation. The amendment suggested not only the taking over but the improvement of the canal for navigation; and in lieu of the taking over, then the condemnation of the property, in order that the value of it might be ascertained. It was solely a navigation proposition, but it involved the taking over, the improvement, and the operation of a canal. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Because it involved the building of a bridge.

Mr. MOORE. No; this particular amendment had no reference to the building of a bridge. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made a point of order against the amendment, and picking up the rules quoted from them, showing that the province of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors pertains only "to the improvement of rivers and harbors." The gentleman from Illinois quoted the rule and then continued:

There is a committee of this House which has jurisdiction of canals, and that is not the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It has been held by Chairmen in the past that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors did not have jurisdiction of bills providing for the construction of canals, and under the rule giving the committee privilege, this bill being a privileged bill, it would not be in order, even if they had jurisdiction over the subject matter, to offer an amendment in reference to the construction or the purchase of canals—because the only privilege they have is in regard to the improvement of rivers and harbors.

The construction or the purchase of canals, he said—

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made his argument, and there was some discussion, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. SPARKMAN] opposing the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois. The present Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], being then in the chair, at one time during the discussion said:

The Chair will state that he will be perfectly willing to reserve his decision until to-morrow. There are ample decisions on the question. It is only a determination of the question whether this canal is in fact a canal. If it is, the Chair thinks, under the decisions which he has before him, that the point of order should be sustained.

And several other times during the discussion the Chair repeated that there were ample precedents tending to sustain the point of order that the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors did not extend to canals.

Now, the present point of order having been raised against a project that is somewhat similar to the one incorporated in the amendment to which I have referred, that of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, it seems to me that the Chair should take into consideration not only what he said with reference to the amendment offered as to the Chesapeake & Delaware, but should also consider those larger and more significant and important questions, the right of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to exercise jurisdiction over water power in which private interests are involved and questions of flood prevention. If we are to have the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors limited with respect to one canal, perhaps that jurisdiction should be limited as to all canals. If we are to have the business of the Rivers and Harbors Committee limited to the matter of the improvements of rivers and harbors only, then it is a question whether the Chair can hold in order any provision in this bill that pertains to canals or to the operation of water power or to the appropriation of money to secure water power either for the Government or for private interests. I contend that under the ruling the Chair has already made, or indicated he would make, the Chair can not consistently rule this amendment in order.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would not have discussed the point of order except that I am very anxious to have the rulings as consistent as possible. I do not know whether I can aid the Chair any or not. The ruling that was made the other day, to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] refers, was a ruling in reference to the authority of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors over canals. That has, as it seems to me, nothing to do with the pending proposition. What is the item before the committee now?

Tennessee River between Browns Island and the railroad bridge below the city of Florence, Ala.: For the completion of the detailed surveys, foundation borings, and preparation of plans for the improvement of this section of the river for the purposes of navigation.

There can be no question that the item so far is in order. It is for the improvement of the river for the purpose of navigation. The question is whether Congress in this bill would have jurisdiction over incidental matters following improvements of the river for the purpose of navigation.

Some years ago, to an item in the river and harbor bill which related to a harbor in Alaska—I do not now recollect which one—I made a point of order that the item was not in order. It went beyond the improvements of the harbor, but the Chair held—and I am inclined to think properly, for I accept rulings when made—the Chair held that the purpose being the improvement of the harbor, incidents that went along with the improvement of the harbor were in order in the same item.

Now, necessarily in some places the improvements of the river produces water power, and if we have authority to improve the river, as the Supreme Court has held that we have, we have the authority to control the incidents that follow the improvement of the river. No other committee of the House would have jurisdiction over a bill for the improvement of the Tennessee River, and there can be no improvement of the river without a possibility of making water power. And there can be no water power developed without affecting the improvement of the river for navigation. It seems to me that this item is different from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and that it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is made against the paragraph by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] upon the theory, as the Chair understands it, that the Rivers and Harbors Committee has no jurisdiction over water-power possibilities in rivers. Clause 56 of Rule XI gives to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors the right to report bills at any time for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

This particular paragraph in this bill provides for an appropriation for the completion of detailed surveys, and so forth, and for the preparation of plans for the improvement of this section of the river for the purpose of navigation. A survey for that purpose is, of course, in order in this bill and within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The paragraph proceeds to say that the investigation is to be made for the purpose not only of reporting as to methods of improving navigation in the river, but the investigation is to have combined with it matters pertaining to the development of water power by the United States alone, or in cooperation with private interests.

If this paragraph in this bill simply contained a provision authorizing a survey in this navigable river for the purpose of determining the water-power possibilities at this point in preparation for future legislation of Congress along that line, the item would be subject to a point of order, and the Chair does not understand that combining a survey for the development of water power with a survey for the improvement of navigation would of itself make the provision, so far as it pertained to water power, appropriate legislation in a rivers and harbors bill.

You can legislate, of course, in a rivers and harbors bill under the rules, but the legislation must be germane to the bill, and of course the bill under the rules can only have reference to the improvement of rivers and harbors. But the Committee on Rivers and Harbors heretofore has assumed jurisdiction of matters not entirely germane under this rule to bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors and for the purpose of improving navigation.

In 1890 the Rivers and Harbors Committee reported out a bill which afterwards became a law which contained a clause to prevent obstructions in the navigable waters and to protect certain public works from injury. In 1891 the bill of that year contained a clause providing for the use of the surplus waters in the Kentucky River for industries, and the same bill provided for reports as to certain commercial statistics.

In 1900 the Committee on Rivers and Harbors reported a bill (H. R. 11876) to regulate the construction and operation of a water-power canal at the Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., and the same year a bill (H. R. 9542) extending the time for the completion of the work of the Muscle Shoals Power Co., of Alabama, and in the same year the bill (H. R. 9824) contained a clause in reference to the floating of loose timber, logs, and rafts in navigable streams.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has exercised jurisdiction over legislation inviting the Government of Great Britain to join in the formation of an international commission to investigate into the condition and uses of the waters on the boundary line whose outlet is the St. Lawrence River, and as to the advisability of locating a dam at the outlet of Lake Erie.

The Chair is not advised that any point of order was made as to these various provisions in these various bills to which the Chair has just called attention. The Chair understands, on the contrary, from an examination of the authorities, that no point of order was made. Therefore these clauses in these bills ought not to be considered as furnishing precedents for this particular clause, which attempts to direct a survey for the purpose of ascertaining water-power possibilities.

But it has been brought to the attention of the Chair that prior river and harbor bills contained a provision authorizing a survey for the purpose of improving this section of this river, combining with it the development of water power by the United States alone or in cooperation with private interests.

The Chair understands from the authorizations submitted and from the acts which have been read that this survey in issue in the paragraph we are now considering is now in progress, it being a survey for the purpose of furnishing the foundation of a report as to the improvement of the river with reference to navigation, combined with the water-power possibilities mentioned in this clause.

The Chair does not understand that there is any difference between a survey in progress and any other public work in progress. There ought to be some doctrine of estoppel applying in matters of this kind. If points of order were now sustained and it should become necessary to go to the sundry civil or some other appropriation bill in order to provide funds to proceed with the survey now in progress which has heretofore been authorized by Congress, it would lead to endless confusion and interfere with public work in operation. The Chair therefore thinks the point of order is not well taken, and the point of order is overruled.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph, and in connection therewith I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] occupied 15 minutes in discussing the merits of this proposition. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] also discussed the merits of the proposition, and I now ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for 15 minutes in the discussion of this motion. I will say I can not present it intelligently in less than that time, if I can do it then.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to enter into some agreement as to the length of time that this discussion should continue.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that before that agreement is reached I may be permitted to present the matter, because I think it is going to open up some fields that ought to be discussed, and it would be better to wait until that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, this matter has been discussed to some extent by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. I think I shall be able to demonstrate that this is not a survey for the information of Congress in any respect, that this proposition is not primarily in the interest of navigation, that it is a new project, and if these propositions be demonstrated I am confident that this item will go out of this bill. It has been repeatedly charged that no item in a river and harbor appropriation bill is ever voted out of the bill by the House. I do not believe that it is possible that this House, if it is convinced that a proposition has no merit, will refuse to vote it out of the bill when it ought to go out. This proposition ought to go out of the bill upon its merits. It ought to go out of the bill as a question of policy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important subject, and the gentleman has given great study to it. I think a full committee should hear the gentleman, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seven Members present, a quorum. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the history of this proposition will throw a great deal of light upon the proposition contained in the bill itself. In February, 1912, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors passed a resolution requesting the Board of Engineers to review all former reports concerning the improvement of this stretch of the Tennessee River and make a report with reference to its improvement in cooperation or without cooperation with private water-power interests. In response to that resolution the Board of Engineers made a very extended investigation. They called for bids from private water-power interests for the construction of dams on this part of the river. Two bids were received, one from the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co. The Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co. made an estimate of the cost of these dams—three of them—of $18,390,000. The Board of Engineers finds that the cost of the dams proposed by this company will be $18,700,000. The Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co. proposed that the Government itself shall advance every dollar of this $18,700,000 and give to it a 100-year lease of the water power created by this dam. The Board of Engineers finds that of this $18,700,000 only $8,500,000 can in any sense be attributed to any improvement of navigation, and that $10,000,000 of the $18,700,000 are for water-power purposes alone. The company proposes to pay to the Government at the completion of the project $3,000,000 and an annual payment during the 100 years in sums that will equal with interest the $10,000,000 that is chargeable to water power alone.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I will yield when I complete my statement. They also propose to pay the Government, when they have installed 200,000 horsepower, 35 cents per horsepower, and that at the end of 20 years in any event they shall pay to the Government 35 cents per horsepower. So the proposition with which we are confronted is that the Government shall expend out of the Treasury within the next six years $18,700,000 for a water-power project.

Mr. Chairman, it is very interesting to read the report of the Board of Engineers. If you send to the document room you will be unable to get one. I doubt whether any Member of Congress to-day can secure a copy of this report. If they could, not a Member of this House who is not primarily interested in that section of the country would vote to keep this item in the bill. With reference to this company itself, it is worthy of observation that the Board of Engineers in calling for bids asked these companies who made bids to give assurance as to their financial responsibility, and it is of course of interest to know who and what the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co. is. I desire to read from their letter to the Board of Engineers. The board said that each bidder should inclose with his proposal sufficient evidence to show what financial backing they had. They say:

> The financial interests which are the support of the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co. and the owners of its securities are engaged on a large scale in the development and operation of water powers in South America, New Mexico, the United States, and Canada, and as large investors in industry requiring great amounts of hydroelectric energy. Their developments going forward at the present time involve an investment of $15,000,000. Representatives of the company will be pleased to state verbally to your board on presentation of this proposal such additional information as can not properly be conveyed in a document of a more or less public nature.

In the first place, the beneficiary of this expenditure, the company to whom it is proposed we shall give the lease, admits that if there is such a thing as a water-power trust in the United States it is a member of it. That is a fair inference. And in the second place, as corroborative evidence that it is the Water Power Trust of America, they refused to make public the names of those who are the financial backers and interested in it. That alone, if nothing else were involved, ought to cause this House to pause before voting one single penny looking toward the making of a contract with this concern. Going on a little further, this same Muscle Shoals Water Power Co. proposes a monopoly of the water-power interest of that section of the country. I again read from the report of the Board of Engineers, and that report states on page 5:

> The Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co. has interests in other power development on the Talapoosa, the Coosa, and the Little River. Connecting these developments with the proposed Muscle Shoals development will make up deficiency in power at the latter place during the seasons of low water. This fact alone enables the power company to plan for an ultimate installation at Muscle Shoals of 680,000 horsepower, measured at the switchboards. The special board states that such combination of power plants, if suitably regulated by State or Nation, will be of far greater public benefit than a number of independent power plants, with incomplete development at each plant.

Now, mark you, in the various streams of this section of the country independent power plants can exist with several hundred thousand horsepower for each of them, but here an absolute monopoly is advocated, that this one company shall have a complete monopoly of all available and potential horsepower in those States. The same argument, Mr. Chairman, that is made for the monopoly by this company can be made in favor of the monopoly of the United States Steel Corporation and of every other kind of monopoly in the United States.

Now, is this primarily for the purpose of navigation? Again, reading from the report—will the Chair kindly inform me when I have used 10 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has just consumed 10 minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the report of the Board of Engineers on that proposition states:

The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors has carefully considered this plan and is in general accord with the views and recommendations of the special board. The project contemplates primarily the conservation of one of the great natural resources of the Nation by the development of power in large amount, and, incidentally, the improvement for navigation throughout the year of a reach of about 82 miles of the Tennessee River.

Now, I only have five minutes left, and I can not undertake to present this proposition in 15 minutes as it ought to be presented, and this House, before considering a proposition of such magnitude as this, ought to have the matter fully and thoroughly presented to it. The gentleman from Alabama states that this is only a proposition for a survey, so that the Government may secure additional information with reference to this improvement. First note the language of the bill itself:

For the completion of the detailed surveys, foundation borings, and preparation of plans for the improvement of this section of the river for the purposes of navigation, etc.

The main purpose, sir, of this $150,000 is to prepare plans for this dam for the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co. If Congress itself shall not undertake to make the improvements, the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co., if it shall avail itself of any privileges granted by the general dam act, will secure the benefit of this $150,000 expenditure upon the part of the Government. And unless, Mr. Chairman, we enter into and adopt a project costing $18,000,000 this $150,000 is absolutely wasted. On page 48 of the report, in answer to the question—

Are any further surveys, examinations, and investigations desirable before undertaking this improvement?—

The board replies:

Other than the diamond borings recommended to be made along the axes of the high dams and along axes of the walls of locks, there is little additional information needed, and it is not believed that the decision as to whether or not it is advisable for Congress to undertake the improvement need wait for the completion of the further examination of foundations, since the preliminary examination indicated foundations of the most satisfactory type.

There is no question but what the foundations are sufficient; none whatever. This $150,000 that you propose sir, is, as the report itself shows, not for additional information, but for the beginning of the project itself. The board closes with this language:

It appears, therefore, to the board that the data on hand and the investigations already made are sufficient to warrant Congress in determining at the present time the desirability of beginning this important improvement.

No question is raised in any report of the Board of Engineers that they have not all the information necessary for Congress to decide whether it shall adopt the improvement or not. Now, what is the purpose of this $150,000? It is stated in the report of the board itself. I read from page 2:

The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors has carefully considered this plan and is in general accord with the views and recommendations of the special board, though believing that a due regard of public interests require that some equitable provision should be made whereby the United States may terminate the lease at any time after the end of 50 years in case it should become apparent that such action is desirable. With this provision, the board is of opinion that it is advisable for the United States to adopt the project outlined by the special board for combined navigation improvement and power development of the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Ala., in cooperation with the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co., at a total estimated cost of $18,701,000, under the conditions specified by the special board.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I will be obliged to ask for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for five minutes additional. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LENROOT (reading)—

The first appropriation should provide for at least $1,000,000 in cash and contract authorization for the balance, with a view to completion of the work in five years.

And now we come to this appropriation, and what is it they want it for? The board says:

In case Congress does not adopt the project at once, the board recommends an appropriation of $150,000 to provide for the completion of the detailed surveys, foundation borings, and preparation of plans—

For what? For further information of Congress? No. So they say—that there need be no unnecessary delay in active prosecution of the work whenever it is authorized.

That is the purpose of this $150,000, and it has no other purpose. It is for the making of plans, the making of the borings—not to inform us, but for the benefit of the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co., when Congress shall adopt the project.

Now, I want to ask you upon the Democratic side of the aisle, are you going to appropriate $18,000,000 for this project out of the Treasury of the United States within the next few years? Are you going to appropriate $1,000,000 for that purpose next year? If you are not, why include this $150,000 in this bill, taking this amount out of the Treasury at this time? [Applause.] There can be no excuse, there can be absolutely no defense for it, except that of committing the United States to a proposition of adopting an $18,000,000 project now or making a gift of $150,000 out of the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of a company that admits it is a monopoly and refuses to give to the public officials of the United States in a public document the names of its financial backers. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard; but if there is anyone on the other side who desires to speak I do not wish to be heard at this time. Perhaps the time ought to be arranged on this paragraph.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. We are going under the rules of the Committee of the Whole, and the time is not arranged for under that rule as I understand it. I am not familiar with the rule, however.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] will proceed.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I believe that anyone who desires to make this bill so that it will not be subject to the criticism that killed the other bill ought to vote for this motion to strike out. There can be no possible question but that when it comes to be considered by the people of the United States to keep this item of $150,000 in the bill as it now stands will be understood by the people as an authorization for the expenditure of $18,701,000. Because there can be no question, Mr. Chairman, that this money is to be expended on this contemplated project. It has been shown by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] beyond any question that the present examination has been completed. But now they contemplate a new project, and they recommend it, and this project involves an expenditure of $18,000,000 on the part of this Government. This $150,000 is the first expenditure that is to be made in the furtherance of that project. It will be claimed by those who will hereafter advocate it that this House has by so doing given its approval to this project.

And that gentlemen may understand distinctly what this is, there ought to be no mistake about the question. It is, in fact, to expend $18,701,000 for the benefit of the hydroelectric company, to commence its operations when this project shall be completed by the money that the United States will furnish them. Listen to what the report says, in section 24, on page 8:

The board therefore reports that, in its opinion, it is advisable for the United States to adopt the project recommended by the special board for combined navigation, improvement, and power development on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Ala., in cooperation with the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co., at a total estimated cost of $18,701,000, under the conditions specified by the special board and with the additional provisions suggested above for possible recall of the franchise after the lapse of 50 years.

Gentlemen should understand then that this is what they are giving their approval to when they vote $150,000 now to be expended. Gentlemen here try to save $5,000 or $10,000 or $50,000. This is an expenditure of $150,000. Can you justify it now in the present condition of your Treasury? Can you justify sending out to the world the fact that unless this $150,000 is afterwards to be considered as the preliminary expenditure on the $18,000,000 project that you have utterly thrown it away? Gentlemen will have to take either one or two of those dilemmas. There can be, then, as I view it, no possible justification for the passage of this section of this bill at this time, and I ask gentlemen who desire to make this bill so that it will stand criticism—if it shall be able to do so at all—to see to it that such items as this are not contained in the bill, or it will meet with the universal condemnation of the people of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, the Tennessee River, which is now under discussion, flows through the district which I represent. This important river is 652 miles long and is divided into three sections by the War Department: The upper section, from 4 miles above Knoxville to Chattanooga, 186 miles in length; the middle division, from Chattanooga to Riverton, 238 miles; and the lower division, from Riverton to Paducah, or the mouth of the river, 226 miles. With its principal tributaries—the French Broad, the Clinch, the Holston, the Powell, the Little Tennessee, and other streams—it forms a system of internal waterways capable of being navigated by steamboats for 1,300 miles for a limited period during the year. The tributaries can be utilized for flat boats and rafting logs for an additional 1,000 miles. This makes a system of navigable waters of 2,300 miles in length, with a drainage area of 44,000 square miles.

During the calendar year of 1913, according to the latest statistics furnished by Mr. C. H. Huston, a leading citizen of Chattanooga, the traffic on the Tennessee River, which was purely local, on account of the river being bottled up at Muscle Shoals, was 1,053,000 tons, the valuation of the same being $13,269,000. Average value, $12.59 per ton. This represents 69,600 carloads, or 3,800 train loads, or 10 freight trains per day throughout the year. The tonnage for 1913 was heavier than the average annual tonnage for the previous five years. This proves that the criticism, constantly made here that river commerce is decreasing, does not apply to the Tennessee River, and yet on the upper section of this river there were only seven months, or 218 days of navigation, on account of low water, and on the middle division 9 months' navigation, and on the lower division 12 months. If the Tennessee River was locked and dammed, in a short time the local traffic would be doubled, and the through traffic would far exceed the local traffic.

The 1913 tonnage on the upper division, or between Knoxville and Chattanooga, was 410,156 tons; valuation, $2,975,855. Average haul 12 miles, and average rate per ton per mile 3.2 cents. Number of vessels engaged 17; barges, 78. Reduced to railroad tonnage this is equivalent to 27,000 carloads, 1,400 train loads, or 7 train loads per day for each day of navigation. The tonnage on this section of the river exceeded by 59,500 tons the annual average for the previous five years.

The business over the middle division was as follows: Number of tons, 104,133; value, $4,431,588; average haul, 38 miles; and average rate per ton per mile, 4.3 cents.

The showing on the lower division was as follows: Four hundred and eight thousand one hundred and five tons; value, $6,130,874; average haul, 174 miles; and average rate per ton per mile, eight-tenths cent. The Government engineers have estimated that there are 1,000,000 undeveloped horsepower on the Tennessee River and its tributaries. The proposition contained in the present bill looking to the improvement of the Muscle Shoals will give a development of 680,000 horsepower. The amount needed in order to improve the river at that point for navigation purposes alone is $8,000,000; and if we develop at the same time the 680,000 horsepower, it means an additional expenditure of $10,000,000, or a total of $18,000,000. The offer of the power company is to repay this entire amount to the Government—$3,000,000 on the completion of the project and the balance as a royalty at 35 cents per horsepower. In other words, the Government of the United States will secure under this arrangement the needed improvement of the Muscle Shoals without it in the end costing the taxpayers of the country a dollar.

Is it good policy to accept this proposition, or decline it and go forward and improve the river for navigation purposes alone, expending for the same $8,000,000? Until this improvement is made at the Muscle Shoals the Tennessee River as a through transportation water route is practically worthless. Now, what is there in east Tennessee that is involved, from a developing or business standpoint, in the improvement by slack-water navigation or canalization of the Tennessee River? We have on the headwaters of this river and its tributaries the largest coal field in the South; the only two large copper plants in the Allegheny Mountains, employing several thousand men; the largest undeveloped slate field south of Virginia; the most valuable and the purest zinc on the American continent; in the course of construction the largest aluminum plant in the world; 10 iron furnaces; millions of tons of iron ore; the largest deposits of the most durable and valuable marble found in the United States, employing 5,000 men in the quarries and mills of this industry; the greatest undeveloped hardwood lumber region; and the growing and thriving manufacturing cities of Knoxville and Chattanooga, with populations close to 100,000 each; and these additional towns located on or near the Tennessee River—engaged in the following industries: Iron, cement, car building, lumber, furniture, tools, cotton and knit goods, and so forth—Rockwood, Harriman, Lenoir City, Loudon, Kingston, La Follette, Clinton, Dandridge, Maryville, Morristown, Jellico, Dayton, and South Pittsburgh in Tennessee, and in north Alabama, Bridgeport, Huntsville, Decatur, New Decatur, Sheffield, and Florence. There are manufacturing points on the Tennessee River paying to the railroad companies from 50 to 75 cents per ton for hauling steam coal from 35 to 60 miles.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BARCHFELD] stated to the House one of the greatest advantages to Pittsburgh as a manufacturing point is that they have cheap water transportation; and as a result are shipping coal by water at an expense of 5 cents per ton 50 and 60 miles. Now, contrast the cost of shipping steam coal to Pittsburgh at 5 cents by water transportation with 50 and 75 cents per ton in Tennessee by rail, and yet these Tennessee towns are located on the Tennessee River, within 50 and 60 miles of coal mines that could be reached by slack-water navigation. We are now compelled to pay from $4 to $4.50 per ton to ship by rail pig iron, marble, lumber, and other raw material to the interior cities, that could be reached by water if the Tennessee River was canalized, and in this way our transportation rates would be reduced at least one-half. We are 300 miles nearer the New Orleans market than the coal fields of western Pennsylvania, and yet we do not sell a ton of coal in that market. We are deprived of cheap water transportation for our coal to New Orleans, and as a result the New Orleans market is given over to the Pennsylvania and Illinois coal fields that have cheap water transportation. We are anxious not only to reduce the cost of transporting the output of our mines, quarries, farms, lumber camps, mills, and furnaces to the interior cities of the United States but, now that the Panama Canal is completed, to enter upon and establish a desirable trade with our Pacific coast and South and Central America. In order to do this successfully the Tennessee River must be open every day in the year, that our unequaled mineral and natural resources may be developed and our mills and factories kept going. We insist and demand of the American Congress that it do for our section what has been granted to the Ohio River.

The Tennessee is larger than the Ohio River; its discharge of water is greater than that of the Ohio and Cumberland Rivers combined, and yet Congress voted $60,000,000 to lock and dam the Ohio and is now hesitating about the expenditure of $18,000,000 on the Tennessee River, every dollar of which is in time to be returned. The very men in this House who are criticizing the proposition which would insure the early improvement of the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals found no objection to the House voting $60,000,000 for the improvement of the Ohio River. These gentlemen hold up their hands in holy horror that this Congress should consider the expenditure of $18,000,000 upon a larger River than the Ohio River and with ten times the amount of natural resources and undeveloped wealth.

There are Members in this House opposing this proposition who get worried, excited, and alarmed when any bill is offered for our consideration looking to the development of water power. They insist upon the passage of water-power bills that are impracticable, that make it utterly impossible to finance a single one of them.

Shall we continue to let 680,000 horsepower on the Muscle Shoals run to waste when we could harness the power at that point and match the North and South with splendid manufacturing cities which would build up our section, give employment to thousands of our people, and add untold wealth and prosperity to our section of the Republic. This water-power proposition at the Muscle Shoals was thrown open to every power company in the land. The far-off State of Wisconsin, through one of its Members [Mr. LENROOT], is deeply concerned about a water-power monopoly in Alabama if this item or proposition is favorably considered. Here is a delegation representing the people of that State, a unit for the proposition. Are they untrue to the interests of their constituents? I deny it. Are they not capable of watching over and caring for the interests of the people of Alabama as well as the gentleman from Wisconsin? If there is a water-power monopoly in Alabama, or will be under this or any other bill, the State has a legislature which can control and regulate it.

I do not believe the Legislature of Alabama, any more than the Legislature of Wisconsin, would be untrue to the interests of the people in matters of this kind. We have heard for years about the cruelty of the "vested interests," and now, when a meritorious proposition comes here meaning so much for my section—for the entire South—we hear the cry "monopoly" and "trusts." In the name of the American people, let us do something for prosperity, for the upbuilding of our country, for the development of our resources, for the employment of our people. Drop these scarecrows and let us invite and encourage capital to improve the rivers and develop the immense water power now going to waste.

If we will do this, we will advance and promote the best and highest interests of the people, rather than by blocking and defeating such measures as the one under consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto end in 17 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate on that paragraph and amendments thereto end in 17 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask one question and have it answered before I agree on that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire how the time is to be distributed?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will try to answer the gentleman's question if I can.

Mr. COOPER. I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. LENROOT] a question. I have not been able to get a copy of the report that the gentleman referred to in his very able speech. For what reason or under what circumstances did the bidders put in a bid in response to the request of the commission? What reason did they give and under what circumstances did they refuse to announce the names of their financial backers? As I understand, the original request for bids required the bidders to say who were their financial sponsors.

Mr. LENROOT. And I read what the response was, where they declined to do it, except verbally. It was in response to a circular issued by the Board of Engineers, inviting bids from the water-power interests upon this project, and also requiring assurances with the proposals as to their financial ability to carry them out. The reply of the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Co. I read, as the gentleman heard, where they declined to give the names of the backers except verbally to the members of the board.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in 17 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. May I add five minutes to the gentleman's request?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR] will conclude the debate.

Mr. LENROOT. I might want to reply to it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman from Alabama wanted 15 minutes. The 2 minutes extra I meant to use myself, but I will let the gentleman from Wisconsin have those 2 minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Do I understand that the gentleman intends to give somebody on that side 15 minutes in which to conclude the debate?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. I intend to yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR] 15 minutes. One of the gentlemen here had 20 minutes in opposition to the provision. I think it is nothing but right that the gentleman from Alabama should have 15 minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] had at least 15 minutes on the point of order, and several other gentlemen on that side had considerable time on the point of order, but discussed the merits of the proposition.

Mr. SPARKMAN. What does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. ANDERSON. It seems to me we ought to have as much time on this side from now on as you gentlemen have had on that side.

Mr. LENROOT. I expect there will be a reply made to the remarks I have made. I would like to have 4 or 5 minutes in reply, not for the last speech, but to whatever speech in presentation is made I would like to have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Of the 17 minutes I will let the gentleman have the 2 minutes that I intended to reserve for myself.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like three minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will ask unanimous consent that all debate on this provision close in 20 minutes, 2 minutes to go to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], and 15 to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like to say to the gentleman that there is a demand from this side of the House for fully seven minutes. I should like to have you provide for that. I suggest to the gentleman that he make the time half an hour.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If we make it half an hour, I shall want two or three minutes myself. I will ask the Chairman to put the request for 30 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Thirty minutes, of which there shall be 10 minutes on this side.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The request, as the Chair understands it, is that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto shall be limited to 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be consumed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR], 3 minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], 2 minutes by the chairman of the committee [Mr. SPARKMAN]——

Mr. STAFFORD. And 10 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The CHAIRMAN. And 10 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, all I wish to say on this amendment is that there can be no doubt about the proposition that the provision in this bill does not commit Congress, nor was it the intention of the committee in framing the provision to commit Congress in any way to this proposition. The sole purpose in spending this $150,000 was to furnish Congress with information upon which it may act in the future, if it sees proper to take up this matter at all, not to commit it or the Government to the project in any way whatsoever.

The reading of the provision will show its purpose, which is, among other things, to prepare detailed plans, plans and information the House will desire to have before it whenever called upon to act, if at all. I do not know whether the House will be called upon to act on this matter in a river and harbor bill or in some separate measure. I do not know that it will be called upon to act upon it at all; but whenever it is called upon to do so, the information called for here will be very important to the House of Representatives or the Congress. That is the sole purpose of the provision, and the only question here is whether the information we are seeking is worth $150,000. I say it is, and this, of course, was the opinion of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors when it inserted the provision in the bill.

Here is a great project. It is great from the standpoint of navigation, it is great from the standpoint of power development, and certainly whenever it comes before Congress, whether in a river and harbor bill or in a separate measure, the House will want the very information we are proposing to give it by the adoption of this provision. Therefore I hope it will remain in the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, this provision in the bill which appropriates $150,000 for a continuing survey also provides for plans for carrying out the work.

I take it that this question is largely one of producing hydroelectric power and securing, if possible, navigation upon that part of the Tennessee River.

The report of the engineers is quite voluminous upon this project, and among other things goes into some details as to what the Government proposes to do in the way of hydroelectric power. I may say that their report is made up largely of that character of work to be done. They go ahead and speak about giving to this hydroelectric company a franchise for 100 years. True, at the end of 50 years it might be taken over by the Government if thought best, but it also provides for 35 cents per horsepower at the end of 20 years or when this company shall have developed 200,000 horsepower. So that if they develop 199,000 horsepower after the work has been installed, then they can use that 199,000 horsepower for 20 years without paying a cent to the Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. The gentleman does not mean to misrepresent.

Mr. FOSTER. No; I thought that was what it stated.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is correct.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I am correct about it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. If you will read the report, you will see that you are not.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I have not misquoted it. If I have, I shall be glad to make the correction.

As I remember, this House passed a general dam bill in which certain regulation of water power was provided. It has been a question in this country for several years, and it will continue to be a question so long as any individual or any company attempts to take over this valuable asset of our country and appropriate it without regard to the rights of the people. [Applause.]

I believe in improvement of rivers and harbors. I want to see the water power of our country developed. I want to see navigation developed; but at the same time I want to see the rights of the people in this coutry protected from the corporations of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. I understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR] wishes to close on behalf of the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. That is my desire. I am perfectly willing to answer any questions.

Mr. LENROOT. I have no objection to the gentleman reserving five minutes to reply, but I suppose he is going to make an argument, and I should like to have five minutes in which to reply to him.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I am rather astonished to find so much misunderstanding of river and harbor legislation in the United States during the whole period of our existence. At one time in river and harbor development we had what may be called the prophetic stage. When it was proposed to construct the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, otherwise called "the canal around the Falls of the St. Mary," to open up navigation on the Great Lakes, a project inaugurated nearly 100 years ago, we had the beginning of the prophetic age—of which we now have a recrudescence. Speaking for the prophets of that day, almost the greatest mind America ever had was Henry Clay, of Kentucky. [Applause.]

On the proposition for a canal at the St. Marys River Mr. Clay said you might as well try to make a canal to the moon. There were some hard-headed constructive minds around the Great Lakes in those days who rejected the criticism and persisted in their efforts to make a canal there. What was the result? It bankrupted the State of Michigan. The State of Michigan undertook internal improvements as a matter of State rights and created an indebtedness of over $5,000,000. In that early period of her life Michigan could not stand such enormous expenditure. The canal was a failure as a State affair. The General Government took charge and it became a success. Although not yet finished, it has developed a canal which is considered the greatest inland waterway in the world, within, I doubt not, a few hundred miles only of the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin. It has cost many millions of dollars and carries many more millions of tons of freight. Long ago it carried more than five times the tonnage that passed through the Suez Canal. It will cost more yet, millions more. It is in the contemplation of the Rivers and Harbors Committee—and we thought our colleagues knew what we were doing, for we have tried to make them know—and is intended to add another improvement there when in the course of time the prophets die and constructive statesmanship finds opportunity to go and examine and survey what is there and report to Congress what is necessary to accommodate what is coming in the future. That is the mission and purpose of the Army engineers under the direction of Congress.

Document No. 20, which my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] criticizes, is one of several reports by the United States Engineers on the Tennessee River. It contains 88 pages of valuable information. Another document, No. 360, Sixty-second Congress, of 198 pages, contains equally valuable information. The distinguished gentleman has given you no information whatever except what is contained in Document No. 20, which is no secret, and was prepared under the direction of Congress and for the distinct purpose of giving information. The Rivers and Harbors Committee of this House has been trying since 1902 to give Congress this information and all that could be obtained on the subject. They have hidden nothing, concealed nothing, and found nothing to withhold.

The other day another gentleman from Wisconsin was annoyed because there were 88 pages of Document No. 20. He is diligent in seeking information. I do not object to it, like to see it, am sometimes somewhat hard-headed myself about information. But I never complain of too much. If the gentleman wants more information he can find it in the other documents on the Tennessee River, which the Board of Engineers were called on to review in the making up of report contained in Document No. 20. A concise history of the several acts, reports, and special boards appointed by the Secretary of War for this great survey and greater purpose, the removal of obstructions—at Muscle Shoals—to navigation and the development of water power at the same time, if desirable and practicable, is here inserted as part of my remarks.

SCHEDULE OF RESOLUTIONS AND REPORTS ON THE IMPROVEMENT OF MUSCLE SHOALS ON THE TENNESSEE RIVER, PREPARED AND COMPILED FOR HON. GEORGE W. TAYLOR, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SEPTEMBER 3, 1914.

(See p. 45 of committee Document No. 20.)

Rivers and harbors act, approved March 2, 1907, page 23, appointing a board of engineers to examine and report on the canal at Muscle Shoals, with a view of improving that section of the Tennessee River in connection with the development of water power.

(See pp. 12 and 45 of committee Document No. 20.)

House of Representatives Document No. 781, Sixtieth Congress, first session, being a report on the examination from Elk River Shoals to Florence railway bridge in Alabama as to the advisability of improvement for the development of water power, which is the report called for in resolution contained in river and harbor act of March 2, 1907.

DOCUMENT NO. 3.

(See p. 12 of committee Document No. 20.)

Letter from the War Department to Col. W. T. Rossell, dated May 9, 1908, containing a resolution adopted by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors on April 29, 1908, calling for a review of report as contained in document No. 781, made in pursuance of a provision of the river and harbor act of March 2, 1907.

DOCUMENT NO. 4.

(See pp. 18 and 24 of committee Document No. 20.)

Committee on Rivers and Harbors, House Document No. 14, Sixtieth Congress, second session, being a report of board of engineers, in pursuance of resolution adopted on April 29, 1908, by the Rivers and Harbors Committee, report being dated January 11, 1909.

It will be observed that Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 preceding were adopted March 2, 1907, to January 11, 1909, while Senator BURTON was in the House and chairman of the River and Harbor Committee, and that the rivers and harbors act of 1907 called for a survey and report by a special board of engineers * * * "in connection with the development of water power." Senator BURTON resigned his seat in January, 1909, upon election as United States Senator.

Thus clearly jurisdiction was given by act of Congress, 1907, to the surveys and reports on the proposition until completed. The work is still in progress.

DOCUMENT NO. 5.

(See pp. 3 and 10 of committee Document No. 20.)

Hearings before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, on page 535 of which will be found resolution adopted June 14, 1910, requesting a review of report submitted in House Document No. 14, Sixtieth Congress, second session.

DOCUMENT NO. 6.

(See pp. 3 and 11 of committee Document No. 20.)

Invitation issued by the Board of Engineers for Muscle Shoals stretch of the Tennessee River improvement, dated March 20, 1913, in which invitation is quoted a resolution adopted by the Rivers and Harbors Committee on February 24, 1912, which resolution superseded resolution dated June 14, 1910.

(See p. 67 of committee Document No. 20.)

This is the invitation of the Board of Engineers asking for bids on the work of improving this section of the river.

DOCUMENT NO 7.

(See p. 70 of committee Document No. 20.)

Invitation of the Board of Engineers for Muscle Shoals stretch of the Tennessee River, dated June 25, 1913, extending the time for receiving bids on the work of the improvement of the Muscle Shoals section of the Tennessee River.

DOCUMENT NO. 8.

River and harbor act approved March 3, 1909, on page 20 of which is a provision calling for a survey of the Tennessee River.

DOCUMENT NO. 9.

(See pp. 12 and 24 of committee Document No. 20.)

House of Representatives Document No. 360, dated December 29, 1911, being a report submitted by Maj. W. W. Harts in response to the above resolution.

DOCUMENT NO 10.

Submission of a report dated May 18, 1914, to the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee on the Muscle Shoals stretch of the Tennessee River, in response to resolution of the Rivers and Harbors Committee dated February 24, 1912. Committee on Rivers and Harbors Document No. 20.

I commend Document No. 20 to the serious and careful study of every Member of Congress and every Senator and to the American people generally.

If the facts reported be wrong, the people and Members and Senators should know it. If they be valuable and sensible they should know it. For myself I have no objection to publicity, widespread and thorough, of this interesting and able report, and a great, interesting, and far-reaching effort to conserve, in the broadest and most patriotic way, the natural rights of navigation and development of water power by the General Government, if possible; if not, by other parties, corporate or private, capable of doing the work, under the full, complete, and fully recognized control of the United States. This is the aim of Document No. 20.

"A little learning is a dangerous thing." Therefore read 88 pages, if the reports contain that many. If, as Document No. 20 frankly declares, other reports of even more pages have been considered and reviewed, read them, if your purpose be real information and your object an understanding of the proposition.

"Too much learning" has been said to be likely to make one mad. There are several kinds of madness. In modern times it even crops out in Congress. I speak from memory. If the statement be challenged I refer the challenger to the incident of Paul before Agrippa. There is nothing to be ashamed of or afraid of in this project of the engineers. On receipt and careful study of it, being much impressed with it and previous views modified by it, I promptly sent a copy to the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], calling his attention to it and asking his advice. He was long my colleague and chairman of our committee, and always my friend. The first work he assigned to me was on a subcommittee to consider a former report on this proposition in connection with water power, in 1908 or 1909. It was turned down on my motion, or suggestion, and another survey requested.

It seemed to me to be a valuable contribution to real national conservation, which means to my mind intelligent development for the use of mankind of all the resources of our people under the direction and control of the United States Government, so that the rights of the people in national and natural resources may be forever protected, maintained, and preserved. In doing this it is but fair the General Government should contribute in money or credit to such developments, especially when the proposition by its own natural situation, position, and formation is of such vast potential possibilities and results that it needs the diligent, continuous supervision and watchful care of the General Government to prevent abuse of the franchise and consequent imposition on the business and rights of the people.

If conservation can be interpreted to mean the preservation and perpetuation of the natural obstruction at Muscle Shoals and other like obstructions by leaving it and them severely alone, with navigation practically arrested on a river with 1,300 miles and more of navigable water, and which by the very nature of the obstruction itself has in itself, by and with constructive effort, the power to generate for constructive purposes and the aid of agriculture, of commerce, and other enterprises more than 500,000 horsepower, then I am altogether mistaken as to the true meaning of that word and the true purpose of the many splendid brains and progressive men who advocate conservation.

It is not the policy of conservation to let arid land remain arid. Millions have been spent in putting them to use by furnishing the one fertilizer needed, i. e., water. I approve that sort of conservation. The proposition suggested by the engineers at Muscle Shoals is identical.

Should the policy of perpetuation of obstructions, of standing still, be followed, how would we ever compete with Germany when this cruel war is over, her armies disbanded, gun factories all abandoned, and the men go "back to the farm," unless we overcome, not perpetuate, the obstructions at all our (Muscle) shoals and harness and develop the mighty horsepower instead of letting it remain asleep and idle, a monument to national neglect and monumental incapacity to utilize the talents, ten times ten, which God has placed in the Tennessee River for our Nation to handle.

What information I had or have or can obtain as a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee will be gladly furnished to all who may desire it. And for whom, what purpose? For whose benefit? For the benefit of the people and to establish the rights of the people of whom and for whom my friend from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] always speaks, and for the direct information of the body of the American Nation.

So, about the same time I took the liberty to forward Document No. 20 to Hon. Gifford Pinchot, a high, perhaps the leading, authority on conservation in this country, a gentleman whom I know personally and admire. He is able, honorable, exceptionally trained in this line, a distinguished man, a distinguished citizen. I wanted him to know all about Document No. 20. I wanted his opinion and advice. So I promptly placed this ferocious document in Mr. Pinchot's hands, because he is truly interested in conservation—which includes river and harbor improvement—and in everything pertaining thereto, including cooperation and coordination of all the forces which are going to make the United States greater than man ever dreamed of, whenever these great interests and forces can be brought together, organized for and by real cooperation, and put in the hands of Congress for constructive legislation. [Applause.]

You can not get information, so far as I am aware, in any more intelligent way than through the professional engineer, of whom, as an American citizen, I believe the United States Army engineer stands at the top.

The Tennessee is a great river and a very interesting study. It has been a school for many thinkers and interesting reading for many more minds variously employed. In the study of the Tennessee River Senator John T. Morgan was educated to take up an Isthmian Canal. In the Senate from what he learned of that river he taught the people of the United States and of the world what ought to be done, and it was done. In like study on the same river Col. Goethals learned to think and perform work which gives him among his brother officers and fellows throughout the nations of the world first rank.

Some mistakes have been made in the plans and construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal—one involving, unfortunately, as I get from the Michigan Supreme Court, bankruptcy in the State of Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied 10 minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I see that I can not conclude in five minutes, and I would like to have a little more time.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes and that my time be extended five minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. How is that time to be divided?

Mr. LENROOT. I will use five minutes and the gentleman from Alabama five minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the committee has the right to close.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR] will close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama be extended five minutes and also five minutes on the other side. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the real proposition, the real question is whether or not you are willing to expend $150,000 to have a complete survey made to determine whether you will proceed with the further improvement of the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals.

The Tennessee River is navigable 1,300 miles, and the tributaries 1,000 miles more, making in the neighborhood of 2,300 miles of navigable waterways. Two hundred and twenty-six miles only lie below the Muscle Shoals, from Riverton, Ala., at the foot of the shoals, to Paducah, Ky. It is Muscle Shoals—not the old canal—which naturally constitutes the great obstruction and which can not be navigated by vessels without locks and dams for a distance of 37 miles.

Above the Muscle Shoals are over a thousand miles of navigable water. With obstruction there it is impossible, as anyone can see, to have continuous navigation the full length of that river. The tonnage average for the last 22 years, as will appear from records in the office of the local engineer now in charge of the Tennessee River, was 1,255,200 tons. The State of Michigan worried with their problem for some years before the United States Government took it in charge. In Alabama, you know, we tried to separate from the General Government, and while we did not become bankrupt on account of the Muscle Shoals Canal, we come very nearly being bankrupt in that effort of separation.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Where does the gentleman get his information that the State of Michigan went bankrupt on account of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I got it from one of the Supreme Court reports of the State of Michigan. I do not remember the title of the case, but I will be very glad to furnish it to the gentleman.

Mr. MAPES. Has the gentleman the reference?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I have not.

Mr. MAPES. I think the gentleman is entirely wrong.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I think I can furnish the authority to the gentleman.

Mr. MAPES. The report of the engineers states that about $1,000,000 were spent on the canal before the Federal Government took it in charge, the money coming from the sale of some land which was donated to the State by the Federal Government. I think the gentleman's information is entirely inaccurate in that particular.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I do not think I am wrong, but I have known engineers sometimes to make mistakes, especially in reference to matters of history. If I am mistaken I will make the correction and put it in the RECORD. I have not thought of it until this discussion came up for some years.

I want to say I am not wholly committed to this proposition in its entirety. I want more information. The improvement at Muscle Shoals was before the River and Harbor Committee before I became a member of it—before I entered Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 15 minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. At this point permission was given to revise and extend my remarks. I promised, if mistaken in my memory of the history of Michigan, to make a correction and put it in the RECORD. I searched for and found the case to which my memory was indebted, and here insert extract from the case of The Attorney General v. Pingree (120 Mich., 550, 556, and 557). The italics are mine:

For the period between 1835 until the financial panic of 1837 occurred the State of Michigan had a wonderful growth. The opening of the Erie Canal and the facilities for travel furnished by the Great Lakes made it comparatively easy for the residents of New York, New Jersey, and New England who were seeking to better their condition to reach our borders. The climate was good and the soil was fertile. The example of New York in constructing works of internal improvement was thought worthy of imitation. The constitution adopted upon the admission of the State into the Union provided—

"Internal improvement shall be encouraged by the government of this State; and it shall be the duty of the legislature, as soon as may be, to make provision by law for ascertaining the proper objects of improvement in relation to roads, canals, and navigable waters; and it shall also be their duty to provide by law for an equal, systematic, economical application of the funds which may be appropriated to these objects." (Const. 1835, art. 12, sec. 3.)

The governor of the new State, in a message to the legislature, called its attention to its duty to act under the constitutional provision. The legislature was not slow to respond. A canal was projected from Mount Clemens to the mouth of the Kalamazoo River and one around the Falls of the St. Mary. A number of State railroads were surveyed and their construction entered upon. To meet the expense, the governor was authorized to borrow, upon State bonds issued for the purpose, $5,200,000. These bonds were all negotiated; though, owing to the failure of one of the companies and one of the banks which undertook to negotiate them, the amount for which they were negotiated never found its way into the State treasury.

It became evident the amount of the loan would not begin to complete the internal improvements already begun. Then came the financial panic. Bankruptcy and financial ruin were upon every hand. The State, at a great sacrifice of its property, made an arrangement with its creditors which left its credit good, but left it very badly in debt. (Cooley, Hist. Mich., 279; Camp., Hist. Mich., 495.)

As the result of this experience, the State had the canal at the St. Marys River, which was afterwards taken over by the Federal Government, and is now one of the most important improvements upon the Great Lakes; a short section of a canal, which has never been of any use, except to furnish water power to private parties; and some uncompleted railroads, which the people were glad enough to have sold to private corporations. Justice Cooley states the situation in detail. (Cooley, Hist. Mich., 289; Attorney General v. Pingree, 120 Mich., 550, pp. 556, 557.)

In addition to some smaller debts, it was determined to borrow five millions of dollars, to expend in various public works. It was expected that by the aid of this sum, and such other donations as might be received from the United States, three trunk railroads could be built across the State, two canals made, several rivers improved so as to be navigable, some small railroads finished, and a ship canal opened around the falls of the St. Marys River. (Outlines of the Political History of Michigan, by J. V. Campbell, p. 495.)

I turn the challenge of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] over to Judge Moore, who rendered the opinion above cited, and Mr. Justice Cooley, a most distinguished and honored American jurist, and perhaps Michigan's greatest and most-approved citizen, also a great historian, and to the historian J. V. Campbell, both of whom have the indorsement of Judge Moore in his opinion.

With this I leave the question whether or not my memory was at fault. I had no intention to say aught against that great State, or speak a word that could justly offend one of her citizens.

It was just about this time, owing to the experience of Michigan and other States, that conservation, or internal improvement—not obstruction—by States played out. Afterwards the Nation took up the work. The locks on the Great Lakes have multiplied and will continue to multiply until American energy decays, and American enterprise becomes effete—"which it ne'er will." May the work of the Nation never cease. Result—a splendid development of our common country everywhere.

Navigation on the Tennessee River proper, in the river through Muscle Shoals, not around it, as is the present utterly insufficient and inadequate canal, is what the engineers after years of earnest study and deliberation have recommended. It is further considered that such a canal can be and should be built as will develop 500,000 and more horsepower. If this be true and feasible and a dam is projected of 100 feet in height, surely the foundations should be carefully surveyed and examined. For such a result would be worth ten times the value of the great canal around the Falls of the St. Marys River. Water power has been developed on the St. Marys River under grant to private parties, as I understand it.

In the report, Document No. 20, pages 1 and 2, the Chief of Engineers recommends a project combining navigation and water-power development in the following words:

Bids were invited by the special board for cooperation by water-power interests in the proposed development. Two bids were received, that of the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co. being deemed the more advantageous to the United States. The cost of providing 6-foot navigation, under a plan contemplating a water-power development satisfactory to this company, is estimated by the special board at $18,701,000. Of this approximately $8,575,000 may properly represent the value of the proposed improvement to navigation, the remainder being chargeable to power development, and to be reimbursed to the United States with interest under a definite schedule of payments, the first to be a cash payment of $3,000,000 upon the completion of the structures at site No. 2, to be followed by 99 annual cash payments in amounts which, with the first payment, will return the entire part of the cost chargeable to power development with compound interest at 3 per cent. In addition, the company proposes to pay each year an amount equivalent to 35 cents per horsepower of installed capacity, beginning as soon as this exceeds 200,000 horsepower, and in any case not later than 20 years after first power is developed. The lease period proposed is 100 years.

The expense of between eight and nine millions ought not to create a panic for what the opponents declare will be of incalculable value as a franchise, because every dollar expended for water power will be refunded to the Government, and more, under Document No. 20.

The time of 50 or 100 years should not offend or paralyze the investigator, because after 100 years the entire property rights become vested in the United States; and 100 years is but a day in the life of a nation, especially one provided, as is ours, with immortality.

Now, about the affiliations and individuals comprising the Hydroelectric Co. I know, as I have said, absolutely nothing. Document No. 20 gives all the information I have or care to have until a survey determines whether the foundations are sufficient for a 100-foot-high dam.

Anybody with the information provided in Document No. 20 can run down and obtain the character and standing of this corporation.

I know but one man connected with this corporation and proposed development, Mr. J. W. Worthington. I have known him personally since 1908 or 1909; by reputation several years longer.

Mr. Worthington is president of a bank and manager of several industrial establishments in good standing.

He is a man of brains and energy, courage, and intelligence. He is a worker and does things, and tries to do more. He is a plain, blunt man, brusque perhaps; bravely, truly loyal, always loyal—a man of whom his State may well be proud.

So far as my memory will respond, I do not know the names of any of his associates beyond what is mentioned in Document No. 20.

A complete conservation project is before you, and the first combining "navigation and water-power development," as stated in Document No. 20, on page 2:

After due consideration of the above-mentioned reports, I concur with the views of the special board and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. Attention is particularly invited to the general comments made by the latter board in the final paragraph of its report relative to the economic questions involved in the financing of joint navigation and water-power developments, of which the one herein proposed is the first to be recommended on a very large scale.

DAN C. KINGMAN,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Hon. S. M. SPARKMAN,
Chairman Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
House of Representatives.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the total stretch of river to be improved by the project to which this item is preliminary is 82 miles, and the total amount to be expended on the improvement for navigation and water-power purposes together is something over $18,000,000, of which amount $8,000,000 is said by the Board of Engineers to be properly chargeable to the interests of navigation. It is not claimed by the board or claimed by anyone, so far as I have heard, during this debate, or, so far as I am able to ascertain by reading the reports, that the commerce to be accommodated by this improvement warrants the expenditure of any such amount.

The report of the Board of Engineers says that the existing commerce of the section as well as the increase which might reasonably be expected to be created as a result of power development is insufficient to justify so great an expenditure for improvement for navigation alone, but that in determining the worthiness of the project there are other criteria that should be considered. What are those criteria? The report goes on to state that it is known that the section of the United States lying within a moderate distance of the Muscle Shoals is in a state of retarded development and that it is rich in mineral resources, which, when fully exploited, will add greatly to the general prosperity.

In other words, the project to which this item is preliminary is intended primarily not for the interests of navigation, but for the development of certain local territory surrounding the project. The proposition does not differ in any particular from the proposition of subsidizing the Pacific railroads. It is a development proposition pure and simple. All that is proposed by the project is that the Government shall provide the funds for the development of a water-power project which in its turn will develop, for the benefit of the local citizens, the resources of the section. The project might be justified if it could be shown to be one of general concern to the United States, but no such claim is made or can be sustained. The benefits to be derived from it are purely local, and, as I have shown, they are not primarily the interests of navigation. The people who live in that locality, if the project is undertaken at all, should be required to contribute to it. It is claimed here that this proposition of $150,000 at the present time does not commit the Government to the project. That is true. But if the Government does not intend to undertake this project, then it must be obvious to anyone that the spending of this $150,000 is a mere waste of money. If the Government does intend to undertake this project, then it is equally obvious, from the report of the engineers, that the expenditure will only inure to the benefit of the water-power company.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, if the controversy upon the evidence that has been presented this afternoon were a matter in court and a jury case, I would ask the court for a direction of a verdict in my behalf, and it would be granted without any question. What were the issues that I presented in my opening? First, that this was an $18,000,000 water-power project, to be paid out of the General Treasury. That is not denied. Second, that it is to go to a water-power monopoly. That is not denied. Third, it is to go to a company that refused to divulge publicly the names of its backers. That is not denied. That it involved a 100-year lease of this water power to this company, and that is not denied. The only other proposition that was urged was that this is not a survey at all, but is a preliminary step, a part of this water-power project itself, and that has not been denied in such terms or in such a way as to afford any foundation for the opposition. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR] says that I presented nothing but what was contained in Document No. 20. I admit that. That is an official document. He says that the Board of Army Engineers stands at the very top. For the purpose of this argument I admit that, and therefore he must admit that when the Board of Army Engineers say that no further surveys are necessary, then the purpose of this $150,000 appropriation is not for further information of Congress, but only to hasten the work when the project is adopted. The only defense of the gentleman, the eminent chairman of the committee, is that Congress would require this information when it shall finally adopt the project.

Mr. SPARKMAN. When it finally is called upon to act upon it; I do not know whether it will act upon it or not.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, when called upon to act upon the project. The gentleman has stood here day after day when assaults have been made upon various items of this bill and has relied upon the reports of the Army engineers with reference to various projects, and the Army engineers have reported with reference to this project that no further surveys are necessary in order to enable Congress to act intelligently upon the subject. That the gentleman will not deny. I have also read——

Mr. SPARKMAN. We are not asking, however, the information of the engineers on that point, because we are asking this information, at least so far as I am concerned, for the benefit of Congress.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see about that. I read with care, sir, the hearings before the gentleman's committee. They were lengthy. There was not a single intimation, there was not a single syllable, in those hearings that any further information was necessary or needed to enable Congress to act upon this project, and I undertake to say that the gentleman must have had in mind in putting in this $150,000 appropriation the purpose for which the Board of Army Engineers asked the appropriation, which is not for the information of Congress, but to hasten the work when Congress adopts the project.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman is mistaken about that, I will say to him, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. LENROOT. I have read and formed my conclusions from the report of the Army engineers, from the proceedings had before the gentleman's own committee, and, I repeat, there is not a syllable before the gentleman's committee that any further information is needed in the way of survey or otherwise before Congress shall act or be called upon to act upon it. Now, Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Wisconsin asked me the question, How it came that this Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Co. refused to divulge the names of its financial backers? The circular issued by the Board of Army Engineers had this provision:

> Bidders should inclose with their bids sufficient evidence to show what financial backing they have, in order to enable the board to give proper weight to their proposal.

And this was their reply. I read it in my opening and I want to read it again:

> The board has asked that each bidder shall inclose with his proposal sufficient evidence to show what financial backing he may have, in order to enable the board to give proper weight to his proposal. The financial interests which are the support of the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co. and the owners of its securities are engaged on a large scale in the development and operation of water powers in South America, Mexico, the United States, and Canada, and are large investors in industries requiring large amounts of hydroelectric energy. Their developments of this nature going forward at the present time involve an investment of about $15,000,000. Representatives of the company will be pleased to state verbally to your board, on presentation of this proposal, such additional definite information as can not properly be conveyed in a document of more or less a public nature.

Why could not they have given the names of their financial backers, unless it was because they were members of a great monopoly and the divulging of their names would prevent this Congress, now or at any future time, from making a 100-year contract with them?

Mr. COOPER. If the gentleman will permit, I notice that they said they would give such information as could properly be given. Will the gentleman state what there could have been in the names of the backers which could not properly be given in a public document?

Mr. LENROOT. From their standpoint the only possible reason would be that it would disclose that the names of those gentlemen were the names of men who are trying to monopolize not only the water-power interest in this section of the country but all the water-power interests in the United States. And, gentlemen, to get back to the original proposition, it has been conclusively shown that it is not a proposition for a survey for further information of Congress, but is an appropriation of $150,000 that will be absolutely wasted unless Congress shall enter upon this $18,000,000 improvement; and if it does not, the sole beneficiary of it will be such water power company as may hereafter secure the franchise to build a dam at this point. Now, I am sure that if the question were squarely presented as an independent proposition the Members of this House would not vote to take the first step in granting to a great monopoly one of the greatest water powers that exists in this country, a company that has refused to divulge the names of its financial backers. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this in closing: I predict that if this item remains in the bill it will open up a discussion in another place that when the 4th day of March comes this river and harbor bill will still be pending and not become a law. Mr. Chairman, I have such confidence in the members of this committee and the Members of this House to say that, notwithstanding this is an item placed in a river and harbor bill, this House this afternoon is not going to say by a vote, by retaining it, that it is in favor of an $18,000,000 expenditure out of the Treasury and a 100-year lease to a water-power monopoly that refuses to give to the public the names of its financial backers. [Applause.]

I insert the report and recommendation of the Board of Engineers upon this proposition:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BOARD OF ENGINEERS FOR RIVERS AND HARBORS,
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1914.

From: The senior member, the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors.
To: The Chief of Engineers, United States Army, Washington, D. C.
Subject: Report on Muscle Shoals of the Tennessee River.

1. The following report is submitted in response to a committee resolution of the House of Representatives dated June 14, 1910, as supplemented by resolution dated February 24, 1912, as follows:

"Resolved, by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, United States, That the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors created under section 3 of the river and harbor act approved June 13, 1902, be, and it hereby is, requested to review its report of January 11, 1909, on the survey of the Muscle Shoals in the Tennessee River as submitted in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 14, Sixtieth Congress, second session, and to submit as soon as practicable a revised report and estimate of the cost of the construction of the necessary locks and dams for the improvement of said river and the development of water power in connection therewith as proposed by the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co., together with a detailed plan of cooperation between said company and the United States, such report and plan to state the equitable amount that the Government of the United States ought to contribute to such work.

"Resolved, by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, United States, That in lieu of the request made by committee resolution dated June 14, 1910, the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, created under section 3 of the river and harbor act approved June 13, 1902, be, and is hereby, requested to review all previous reports on the survey on that reach of the Tennessee River in the State of Alabama from Browns Island to the railroad bridge below the city of Florence, Ala., and to submit as soon as practicable a revised report and estimate of the cost of the necessary locks and dams for the improvement of said river for navigation and the development of water power in connection therewith, considering not only the case of no cooperation on the part of the United States with any corporation or water-power company whatsoever, but also the cases of cooperation with any and all such companies; and to inquire into and report the probable amount and value of water power that can be developed in this reach of the Tennessee River under conditions of both minimum and maximum flow; and to take such steps as may be advisable, by advertising for bids or otherwise, to ascertain as definitely as practicable the fair value of the water power which can be developed, submitting estimates separately for each dam and reporting also upon the probable cost of supplying foundations and other under-water facilities at each one of the locks and dams in connection therewith whereby power can be later generated and developed; all these investigations and reports to be made with a view to providing for an immediate slack-water navigation of 6 feet, capable of later deepening to 9 feet.

"The purpose of the foregoing resolution is—

"1. To allow, if desired, of an absolute elimination of any or all cooperation with any corporation in the work of improving the Muscle Shoals reach of the Tennessee River.

"2. If any private proposition for this improvement is considered by the board, to report upon all which may be offered or secured, giving the estimate of the construction cost of each, having in view the preservation of all the water power that can be developed in this reach of the Tennessee River.

"3. In estimating the water power which can be developed at the dams of such slack-water navigation, to take into consideration the annual flow of the river with its variation for the past 25 or 30 years if data can be had, so as to be able to report the minimum flow as well as the probable maximum flow of the river, and the probable amount of primary and secondary or other fluctuating power which can be developed."

2. To secure and compile the necessary data for the full consideration of this subject, a special board was appointed by the Chief of Engineers, and it conducted surveys, held hearings, corresponded and consulted with power interests, and advertised for and received bids for franchises for water-power development at Muscle Shoals. The special board's report, with its appendixes, is full and comprehensive and attention is invited thereto for details.

3. In considering an improvement which will provide for a navigable depth of 6 feet throughout this reach, capable of development later to 9 feet, study has been made of a number of different plans, including lateral power canals and power dams varying in height from 20 to 100 feet. The plan first adopted by the board as best suited for the combined uses of navigation and water power provides for four dams, with locks, and foundations at three of them for power plants.

4. The lower dam is intended only to provide navigation facilities between the Florence Bridge and the downstream power dam. For reasons stated, it is not deemed advisable to have the lower dam across the river, and it is proposed to construct a low lift lock at or near the Florence Bridge in the chute back of Pattons Island, connected to the island by a concrete overfall dam. The island end of the dam is to be connected with the river wall of Lock No. 2 by a concrete wall. This lock and dam will be out of service at and above a 16-foot stage, at which time navigation can pass over the dam. Dams Nos. 2, 3, and 4 are to be power dams, the lifts being, respectively, 58.5 feet, 35 feet, and 40 feet. Each of the four dams is to be of concrete, with gravity section. The chamber dimensions of the locks are 60 by 288 feet, corresponding with the completed Hales Bar Lock. Lock No. 2 is to have a double life, or a flight of two chambers, the other locks having single lifts.

5. The estimates of cost, including flowage damages, are:

Lock and Dam No. 1	$850,000
Lock and Dam No. 2	5,628,000
Lock and Dam No. 3	4,700,000
Lock and Dam No. 4	5,657,000
Total	16,835,000

To increase the 6-foot navigation to 9 feet would require an additional cost of $410,000.

6. With reference to the proportion of cost chargeable to navigation, the special board estimates that of the above total approximately $8,575,000 may properly represent the value of the proposed improvement to navigation interests. The remainder, $8,260,000, would represent the amount chargeable to power development.

7. The special board estimates the primary switchboard power for the three dams at 113,000 horsepower. With the proposed power plant there would also be secondary power amounting to 90,000 horsepower available 8.5 months each year on the average.

8. Based upon these plans of the special board, bids were requested by advertisement under date of March 24, 1913, to be opened June 24, 1913. Upon representation that the time given in the advertisement was too short, bids were again requested by advertisement under date of August 28, 1913, to be opened December 11, 1913. Two bids were received under the first advertisement and only one under the second, this being from the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co., one of the original bidders. For reasons given by the special board, favorable consideration is given only to the last bid of this company.

9. The plans of the company provide for a modification of the plans of the special board by increasing the height of Dam No. 2, with an additional lock chamber, and omitting No. 3 entirely, but otherwise the projects are practically the same. Under the company's plan Dam No. 2 will have a crest elevation of 500, the maximum head at the power house being 99.5, while the combined lift of the flight of three locks will be 93.5 feet.

10. The company estimates its plan will cost, including $1,000,000 for a contingent fund, $17,349,100. This estimate does not, however, include the work below Dam No. 2. Revised figures by the company give the cost of its project as follows:

Lock and Dam No. 1	$752,600
Lock and Dam No. 2	9,931,800
Lock and Dam No. 4	6,587,100
Contingencies	1,124,000
Total	18,395,500

The special board's estimate of the power company's plan is $18,701,000.

11. The plans of the company will provide for practically the same navigation facilities as those of the special board, and they are considered better from the standpoint of power development. The additional estimate of the power company for the complete development of its plan, including power houses, transmission lines, etc., is $35,205,000, the estimate for the initial installation of 210,000 horsepower being $25,428,000.

12. The Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co. has interests in other power developments on the Tallapoosa, the Coosa, and the Little River. Connecting these developments with the proposed Muscle Shoals development will make up deficiency in power at the latter place during the seasons of low water. This fact alone enables the power company to plan for an ultimate installation at Muscle Shoals of 680,000 horsepower, measured at the switchboards. The special board states that such a combination of power plants, if suitably regulated by State or Nation, will be of far greater public benefit than a number of independent power plants, with incomplete development at each plant.

13. The company proposes to make a cash payment of $3,000,000 upon the completion of the structures at site No. 2 and to make 99 annual cash payments thereafter, in amounts which the special board believes will, with the first payment mentioned, return the entire part of the cost chargeable to power development with compound interest at 3 per cent. In addition the company proposes to pay each year an amount equivalent to 35 cents per horsepower of installed capacity, beginning as soon as this exceeds 200,000 horsepower, and in any case not later than 20 years after first power is developed.

14. The invitations to bid requested that proposals be made based on lease periods of 20, 50, and 100 years. No bids were received for any but the 100-year period. The reasons for this are given by the power company and recited by the special board. The special board's study of the question of the proper length of time for power lease at Muscle Shoals leads it to the conclusion that a 20-year lease is wholly out of the question, that a 50-year lease would prevent the development unless coupled with a provision of renewal of the lease for another 50-year period, and that in this case the lease period should properly be placed at 100 years. The special board then gives its views as to the proper procedure at the end of the leased period.

15. After its exhaustive study and full discussion of this subject, the special board concludes with the recommendation that the United States undertake this improvement in connection with the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Co., under certain conditions specified.

16. One member of the special board submitted a minority report, advocating the view that by reason of special benefits enjoyed by local interests, they should be required to furnish to the United States free of cost all necessary lands and flowage rights, estimated to cost about $1,750,000. The majority of the special board, while in general sympathy with the adoption of such a policy on river and harbor work, considered it inadvisable to make the innovation in this case, as it would doubtless lead to considerable delay and would be apt to defeat the present opportunity to make this improvement on favorable terms.

17. All former investigations of combined navigation improvement and water-power development at Muscle Shoals have ended with the conclusion that under the conditions then existing such a project was financially impracticable because the total cost was considerably greater than the sum of the amounts that the United States and the power interests were justified in expending for navigation and power purposes, respectively. A plan is now presented, however, that provides not only for returning to the United States with compound interest at 3 per cent all expenditures in excess of the amount estimated by the special board as properly chargeable to the interests of navigation, but also for the payment of an annual rental for power developed that will at least partly compensate the United States for its expenditures in behalf of navigation.

18. The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors has carefully considered this plan and is in general accord with the views and recommendations of the special board. The project contemplates primarily the conservation of one of the great natural resources of the Nation by the development of power in large amount and incidentally the improvement for navigation throughout the year of a reach of about 82 miles of the Tennessee River. An expenditure by the United States of $18,701,000 within a period of 5 years is contemplated. Of this total, $8,575,000 is estimated as the cost of the portion of the work which properly may be considered as an improvement of navigation.

19. The existing commerce of the section, as well as the increase which might reasonably be expected, apart from what may be created as a result of the power development, is insufficient to justify so great an expenditure for improvements for navigation alone. But in determining the worthiness of the project there are other criteria that should be considered. It is known that the section of the United States lying within a moderate distance of the Muscle Shoals reach of the Tennessee is in a state of retarded development. It is endowed with mineral, forest, and agricultural resources, which when fully exploited, will add greatly to the general prosperity. It is the belief and expectation of those interested in this project that the development and utilization of the power now wasting in the Tennessee River will cause the establishment of manufacturing industries which will utilize the raw materials found in the immediate vicinity. For example, with electric power provided at low cost, metallurgical processes can be employed in the reduction of ore deposits of the region otherwise unavailable for use. Further, that the fertilizers needed for the profitable production of cotton and now brought from great distances can be made at low cost in the close neighborhood of the fields in which it is to be used.

20. To secure the installation of such industries more is required than the mere production of power. There must be an assurance that the power supply will be ample, continuous through and for an indefinite period of years, and that the rates charged shall be low. Due to the varying volume of flow of any stream, the assurance of an ample and continuous supply may require that the power shall be developed from several different watersheds and all combined into a single system for distribution, each reenforcing the others. To assure continuous availability of power long-term contracts with the various manufacturers will be necessary.

21. All this implies large investments of money. To secure such investments the entire project must be made attractive. Long-term concessions of power rights are required, on easy terms, together with such contract provisions as will give investors the assurance of a suitable annual income and of the ultimate return to them of their capital.

22. On the other hand, the streams are the property of the entire people. The benefits to be derived from their use must be returned to the people. Therefore due care must be taken to protect the public interests. Concessions of rights to use the streams should be made after open competition and to those who offer the most advantageous terms. Grants of rights should be for short terms or for longer terms, with a so-called recapture clause, in case the public interests should so require. The rates charged for the power should be regulated by a proper public commission. This regulation of rates is deemed essential for the protection of the public, as well as for the protection of investors. In enterprises of this character it is impossible to predict future values or to fix in the original grant terms of payment and rates to be charged for power which shall in the future meet the essential conditions of a fair profit to investors, and no more.

23. Applying the above conditions to the project presented, the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors believes that while the exceptional difficulty of financing so great an enterprise would justify a long-term contract, the term of 100 years recommended by the special board is so long that changes in conditions might make the terms of the proposed contract disadvantageous to the public interests before its expiration.

or those interests might require a change of grantee. Therefore this board believes that there should be a condition imposed upon the 100-year term that the United States may at any time after the period of 50 years terminate the lease and take possession of all the property used for the generation and distribution of power upon payment to the power company of its value as a going concern. As it is essential that the users of the power should be assured of its permanent availability, provision should be made for the United States taking over all fair contracts for power in force at the time the lease is terminated, and this requires that all contracts extending beyond the first period of 50 years, as well as all those made thereafter, before being executed should be submitted to the United States for approval in order to make them valid after a possible termination of the lease.

24. The board therefore reports that, in its opinion, it is advisable for the United States to adopt the project recommended by the special board for combined navigation improvement and power development on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Ala., in cooperation with the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co., at a total estimated cost of $18,701,000, under the conditions specified by the special board and with the additional provisions suggested above for possible recall of the franchise after the lapse of 50 years. The first appropriation should provide at least $1,000,000 in cash and contract authorization for the balance, with a view to completion of the work in 5 years.

25. The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors concurs with the special board in the recommendation that in case Congress does not adopt the project at once, it is at least advisable to make an appropriation of $150,000 to provide for completion of the detailed surveys, foundation borings, and preparation of plans in collaboration with the engineers of the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Power Co., so that there need be no unnecessary delay in active prosecution of the work whenever it is authorized.

26. As this is the first project recommended for cooperation of the United States with power interests in river work on a very large scale, the board invites attention to the unusual demands such work will make upon public funds. The development and utilization of the power of the streams of the United States will require an investment of great sums of money, and to insure the required continuity of action through successive lease periods other large sums must be available from time to time. There is little doubt that such investments are justifiable and wise, and that the utilization of this power of the streams now being wasted will increase prosperity in a measure hard to be determined. If the United States is to have full control and is to guarantee continuity of operation, it is apparent that at times it will be called upon, for longer or shorter periods, not possible of being foredetermined, to make expenditures comparable with the original sums invested by corporations, and that these expenditures will be returned only after considerable delays, perhaps of years. Whether the annual income of the United States is great enough to supply such large sums, and whether justice to the present generation would warrant such a use of income, are economic questions requiring legislative determination.

For the board:

W. M. BLACK,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, there is no such proposition as this before you. The proposition before you is simply to make a survey, to spend $150,000——

Mr. BUTLER. Let me ask the gentleman, Who are the real backers of this concern? Tell some of us innocent people who they are. Are they good people?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I have not the slightest idea but the people, as far as I know, are good people.

Mr. BUTLER. I mean the people to whom the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] referred?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I have not the slightest idea. That is utterly no concern of mine.

Mr. BUTLER. Does anybody know who they are?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman from Alabama permit an interruption?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I do not want to, but I will have to do so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This concern is a corporation, is it not?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does not its charter show who are its board of directors and its president?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I presume it does.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They are public documents from which any information can be obtained?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. They are public documents from which any information can be obtained at any time.

What I desire to say is that the situation is not understood, I think, even by my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. The real situation, so far as I am concerned, is navigation. The last order to the engineers was to so make their investigation that they could eliminate any water-power company or any private interest and report on navigation.

Mr. LENROOT. I was relying upon the report of the Army engineers.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. You had a right to do that, but not as to this proposition. At least I think not. I do not know what you were relying on, to be candid about it. I want to state the facts as to this.

There is an obstruction in the Tennessee River, at Muscle Shoals. It is an obstruction of navigation in the first instance. The first intimation I ever had in reference to this obstruction was a canal built there 30 or 40 years ago, and that canal is utterly inadequate. It can not do any business for this river, which is 1,300 miles long, and those obstructions must be removed. When that canal was built the question of water power was not known in the United States, and it is only of late years that such a proposition has come to the attention of the people of the United States. So the question now is a question of navigation. The engineers say they think $8,000,000—so this report tells you—is as much as navigation ought to bear if any cooperation is to be had with anything else other than navigation. The same engineers tell you it will take $9,000,000 to make that whole canal serviceable as a connecting link between the upper and lower rivers. I do not want to spend $9,000,000 for a canal that goes outside of the main body of the Tennessee River, because if that is done, and you make that canal a $9,000,000 canal, capable of doing that particular work, you end the Tennessee River as a possibility hereafter of developing the water power that is there. I would like to see the navigation confined to the river, and let that canal go to pieces if it is worthless, and it certainly is now. Everybody familiar with it knows that it does not do the work, and that it costs, I believe, $56 a ton—and I am trying to quote from the Senator from Ohio on the subject—to carry the tonnage on the canal, known as the Muscle Shoals Canal, that surrounds this Muscle Shoals obstruction. My purpose is—and my sole purpose when I first undertook, under the direction of this committee, to consider the water-power proposition in 1908 was—to turn it down. I did not ask you to turn it down. I did not give Mr. FREAR, or any other gentleman who is inclined to get information to study the question and waste his time about it, any information. It was there for me, and I turned it down myself because I did not approve of it. They were then asking $32,000,000, and it was a proposition initiated by a water company, and I did not want to do the work of the United States in that way. The proposition was not to give the General Government control of it. I believe in the General Government having control of the operation of all the waters on all the navigable rivers in this country.

In 1911 your distinguished leader of the minority on this floor [Mr. MANN] taught me in two or three hours more than I had known before on the subject in his opposition to a bill brought in here from the Senate to give a company called the Alabama Power Co. rights in the Black Warrior River, and it was from his remarks and his amendments offered to that bill that this new instruction was given to the engineers so as to call for that information that has come to us now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. What happened then? The engineers in adopting that project changed Lock No. 17 from a lift of 21 feet to 63 feet upon a preliminary survey that gave foundations sufficient for a lock with a 21-foot lift. They went to work on the preliminary survey they made before and had not been at work more than six months before the foundations were found at fault, and Congress had to pay $250,000 for a mistake made in the matter of foundations when the inquiry was for foundations for the 21-foot lift. And it was changed to a 63-foot lift. Now, what do the engineers say to you here? Read it frankly. I do not know anything about it except from that report and the previous reports of the engineers. They have proposed now two locks instead of having four locks, as it was at first thought; instead of a 63-foot lift, 100-foot lift. They tell you they have made borings, not on the particular page from which the gentleman there read, but on page 18, section 18, and they tell you that they have made these examinations; and, while they believe that that would be sufficient, if they are going to go into the river they would rather know what those foundations were. And when they are going to raise it to 100 feet, why, it is necessary they should know.

Congress two years ago appropriated $200,000 for an examination of the proposition to extend the work of the Mississippi Commission up above Cape Girardeau—I think that is the name of the southern point. There is in the bill $200,000 for the examination in regard to that matter before they would go into it. This is not necessarily an $18,000,000 proposition. If the result of that investigation shows they can make navigation in the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals for $8,100,000, or $9,000,000, I would rather have that than to have the old canal at $9,000,000. And that question is before you, I will say to my friend from Wisconsin, as well as the other.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman is aware that the board itself states that except for this high dam those borings would not be necessary, and borings are only at this particular point?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. No; I am not aware of that.

Mr. LENROOT. Read the report.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I did, but I did not understand it as you read it. That is perhaps my fault. I am sure the gentleman did not misread. His emphasis might have been different, according to the way he felt. You know we sometimes do it that way. When I read this paper it does not say that to me. They say that while the indications are that the foundations are satisfactory, they will have no difficulty in obtaining cut-off flow in the dam, but it must be remembered that the work can not begin on these completed structures until an investigation is made of the conditions of the bedrock. It does not make any difference whether they go into the river proper for navigation purposes or into the other, or both. I am anxious to leave it on that proposition of the Muscle Shoals proper, where the proposition is on the part of the engineers to take $9,000,000 to make that canal a success, where it is now a failure in these days of better facilities.

I have no connection in the world with a water-power company, not the slightest. When my attention was first called to this matter——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. FOSTER. And I, Mr. Chairman, make the same request.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to revise and extend my remarks and insert some authorities that I used.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to any of these requests?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], striking out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] demands a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 62.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. SPARKMAN and Mr. LENROOT to act as tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to strike out the paragraph.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 62.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out is sustained, and the paragraph is stricken out. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Big Sandy River, W. Va. and Ky.: For completing guide wall below Lock No. 1, $25,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the paragraph, lines 9 and 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 26, by striking out lines 9 and 10.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that this is the last of a number of small items that I care to bring to the attention of the committee. I desire to present the facts shown by the engineers' reports. On this project of 57 miles, Big Sandy River, there has been expended by the Government $1,626,125. The main river is navigable from the mouth to Louisa, 57 miles in length.

The commerce is what I would like to call attention to. In 1913 the commerce amounted to 172,403 tons. Of that amount timber, poles, and ties amounted to 172,126 tons, leaving a net amount, after deducting the timber, poles, and ties, that float or go with a slight depth of water, 227 tons that averaged 38 miles. Interest and depreciation on this item would amount to $65,045, according to the average method of estimating. Maintenance on this item last year amounted to $31,998, or a total of $97,043 at Government expense last year for 227 tons of freight, after deducting the floatable timber, amounting approximately to $300 a ton of cost to the Government that furnishes the waterway.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I wish to refer to some figures that have been given by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to the press, in which he stated that on the Arkansas River, deducting timber, the cost to the Government has been $95 a ton for the year 1912. I find that in Red River the cost, deducting timber, was $68 a ton to the Government. On the Black Warrior River the average is about $73, as near as can be estimated, on an appropriation of nearly $10,000,000. On the Muscle Shoals, that we have just passed, the cost to the Government last year was approximately $25 a ton on $3,000,000, which was put through at this point. On the Big Sandy River, which we have just read, the cost to the Government per ton last year has been approximately $300, after deducting floatable timber. And I suggest that while it may be true, as was stated a few moments ago, at the beginning of the session to-day, that not an item in this bill can be subjected to any criticism, in view of the vote just had on the last amendment and in view of the facts presented on the Big Sandy River, it seems to me that criticism can be abundantly leveled at many of these items.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to verify the gentleman's figures. Does he say that the report shows that on the Muscle Shoals proposition the cost has been $25 a ton, and that on this Big Sandy proposition it is $300 a ton?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; after deducting floatable timber.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In ascertaining that, the gentleman takes all the appropriations that have been made for the river since the Government has appropriated for it—in the case of the Arkansas River, for instance, for more than 60 years—and charges that against the river, and then credits it with the commerce that floated in one year?

Mr. FREAR. That is because this is all the commerce that has floated during the year. The interest charges and cost of maintenance are considered for the year, and the traffic for the same year shows the result stated. It is the only practicable way to ascertain the cost to the Government and the one generally adopted for ascertaining the cost of maintaining such waterways.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. But you do not credit it with the commerce that floated upon it during all those 60 years.

Mr. FREAR. No; but it has never decreased down to 227 tons before. According to the report last year it was 400 tons and some odd after deducting the timber. There has been a net loss during the last year of about 50 per cent in the net commerce, deducting the timber. I have endeavored to fairly determine the cost to the Government of carrying on the traffic that floats on this stream.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] makes an objection to this small item without knowing that the whole amount of $1,600,000 that has been spent on this river is made ineffective for the lack of this $25,000 that we ask for in this bill; so that if the Big Sandy River can have the benefit of this small appropriation, the whole amount which has been expended before will be made available. They should have continued the improvement of the Big Sandy the same as they should have continued the improvement of many other rivers which this Congress has not continued. I want to say that this river goes into the greatest coal field in the world. If this improvement had been continued as it should have been, but has not been on account of such obstructionists as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], coal could now be put into Cincinnati for 25 cents a ton, whereas it costs $1.10 a ton by rail. This is one of the most meritorious improvements that there is in the bill in proportion to the amount of expense that it carries. But the gentleman from Wisconsin does not look at these projects as meritorious propositions at all. He simply objects in a general way, and thinks that his objections ought to be looked upon as a great thing on account of the number of them. If the gentleman knew of any propositions in this bill that were not meritorious, and made his speeches against them, they might have some weight with this House and with the country; but the objections that he makes will have no weight with this House and are having less weight with the country, because the people know why he is making these objections.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SPARKMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Kentucky desire?

Mr. FIELDS. Five minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto end in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto conclude in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, there have been five dams constructed in the Big Sandy River. Dam No. 1, near the mouth of the river, is about 1,200 feet from the channel of the Ohio. The engineers who made the report favoring the construction of the first dam foresaw the danger of sand banking below the dam, which would obstruct navigation except in time of tidewater and recommended that a wall 1,200 feet in length be constructed from the dam to the channel of the Ohio River for the purpose of flushing out the sand and preventing an obstruction by a sand bar. Seven hundred feet of the wall were completed, but for lack of funds the work was stopped. This appropriation is for the purpose of completing the balance of the 1,200 feet as recommended by the engineers. So far as the 700 feet extends there is no sand in the way, but immediately below the end of the present wall a sand bar has formed since the construction of the dam that absolutely prevents navigation of the river except on tidewater. With this condition the money expended in the Big Sandy River is not only an absolute loss, but had better not be spent, because before the construction of the lock we could use the Big Sandy River in ordinary water, but as it is now packet boats can only enter the channel on tidewater, which renders the river practically useless.

This river empties into the Ohio in a jobbing center. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES] has pointed out the advantages to be derived from navigation on the Big Sandy River by the coal fields of the upper Big Sandy, but I want to point out a few advantages to be derived from navigation by the jobbing cities of that section of the country at or near the mouth of the river.

Huntington, W. Va., the home of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES] ships thousands of dollars' worth of merchandise up the Big Sandy River by boat when there is an opportunity to do so. The cities of Kenova, W. Va.; Catlettsburg, Ashland, and Greenup, Ky.; and Ironton and Portsmouth, Ohio, ship thousands of dollars' worth of merchandise up the Big Sandy by boat when the boats can get into the Big Sandy River; but they can not get into that river now except on tidewater on account of the sand bar that has formed below the dam. The completion of the wall provided for by this item will confine the current to the main channel of the river, giving it sufficient force to carry out the sand, thereby keeping the channel open, which will enable boats to run on the river practically all or a goodly portion of the year. I therefore hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the paragraph may not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the paragraph.

The question was considered, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ohio River: Continuing improvement and for maintenance by open-channel work, $684,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, at the end of line 18, add the following:
"Provided, That $50,000 of said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used for the repair and maintenance of the harbor and levee at Shawneetown, Ill."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this paragraph close in 12 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes, not on the amendment but on the paragraph.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that this amendment does not add anything to the appropriation in this bill. I presume that many of you will remember that I have been making an effort for the purpose of securing relief to Shawneetown for the last two years. That it is a meritorious proposition goes without saying. Shawneetown lies on the Ohio River about 75 miles below the city of Evansville. It is the oldest town in the State of Illinois, having been laid out in 1807 and 1808. The Government laid out the town and sold the lots. It is a place where the land office of the United States was located; the place where the Government of the United States sold out all of the lands lying in and about that territory. It now forms one of the best harbors on the Ohio River from Evansville to Cairo.

The town has some superior qualities over any other harbor on the Ohio River, in that it gives a harbor during high water, which is not afforded by any other railroad town from Mount Vernon, Ind., to Paducah, Ky., a distance of something like 100 miles or more. That being the case, it affords an advantage to river men which can not be had in any other way or in any other place.

The Government of the United States began to construct a levee in front of the city of Shawneetown more than 50 years ago. It is an old project, as old as any other project on the Ohio River. The gentlemen who compose this good committee can not say or interpose that this appropriation ought not to be made because it is a new project, for it is not a new project; it is an old project, a continuing project, because the Government from time to time has expended $80,000, whereas the citizens of Shawneetown have spent nearly $300,000 to maintain and keep up the levee. I dare say that there is no other place on the Ohio River, or any other river in the United States, that has a more meritorious proposition than this. The good chairman of this committee gave me an assurance at the last session of Congress that a strong effort would be made for the purpose of including an appropriation to take care of this harbor at this session of Congress. Now he opposes it.

The only matter which has intervened between the committee and this appropriation, as I understand, is because there is a levee proposition connected with it. I want to say that the levee itself is the very essence of this harbor, and for a distance of 100 miles there is no place on the Ohio River during high water that a steamboat can land at a railroad station for the purpose of taking on commerce or giving to the country commerce that is brought from other places. That being true, it becomes one of the most essential points on the Ohio River. To my mind, it is one of the cases wherein there ought to be relief. Now I call your attention to the fact that if this harbor is not kept up, if this levee, which is the essence of the harbor in time of high water, is not maintained, then an important landing place will be destroyed. If the levee should break, the town is flooded and every family in Shawneetown is compelled to flee to other quarters for homes.

The floods of 1913 inundated the city, compelling the entire population to flee to the hills in midwinter and take shelter in tents. You gentlemen in your generosity, pregnant with the idea of relief to the suffering, came forward during that year and appropriated liberally for the purpose of taking care of those unfortunates. I say it is far better to take care of this harbor, to take care of this levee while we are in sober moments before the extreme happens and our sympathies are aroused to the highest pitch for relieving the suffering. I say it is far better for us to make a liberal appropriation for the purpose of maintaining this harbor and helping to keep up this levee while we may do it in time of peace than to wait until we meet the war of angry floods in its devastation and destruction of life and property, and then to be compelled to appropriate large sums for charity. Congress has done this more than once. Good business sense demands that this amendment should be adopted, thereby making it impossible for a repetition of these heartrending disasters.

Mr. LOBECK. It extends out on the farm lands?

Mr. FOWLER. Indeed, the Ohio River at that point when the floods are up is something like 5 miles wide, extending out over a territory in Illinois and the territory in Kentucky. It is an exceedingly fertile territory on both sides; one of the greatest corn belts not only in America, but one of the greatest in the world, and the levee that is to protect and keep up this harbor is about 5 miles long. I want to say to you, my friends, that if you will come with me and assist me in getting this $50,000 appropriation I will warrant that Shawneetown will put up $50,000 by the side of it, so that there may be all of the assurance that is necessary in order that this preparation in time of peace may be made ample and secure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FOWLER) there were—ayes 11, noes 45.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ohio River: Continuing improvement by the construction of locks and dams with a view to securing a navigable depth of 9 feet, $2,500,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary to prosecute the said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $2,500,000, exclusive of the amounts herein and heretofore appropriated.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, at the end of line 2, insert:

"For improving the harbor at Maumee, Ill., on the Wabash River, $10,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. This is offered as a new paragraph?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] desires to discuss the paragraph that was just read. I suppose there will be no objection to his doing that after this is disposed of?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think there will be no trouble about that, after we dispose of this.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, Maunie is a thriving town on the banks of the Wabash River, a few miles above its mouth. It lies in one of the richest corn belts in southern Illinois. The banks in front of Maunie are sandy and easily washed and cut away. That the Wabash River is one of the greatest rivers of this country I suppose no one will deny. While its commerce is not as great as it might have been, it is because but little or no improvements have been made upon it within the last 15 or 20 years. At Mount Carmel, above Maunie, is a lock and dam, built about 25 years ago, which of itself is one of the best dams in that section of the country and is the only one on the Wabash River. If the Wabash were properly taken care of by locks and dams, it would far exceed the expectation of the gentlemen who are now in favor of the improvements of the Brazos and Trinity Rivers; but unfortunately there has been but little attention given to this river within the last few years. The harbor at Maunie ought to be preserved and taken care of. If you do not do that, I want to warn you now that you will neglect one of the best rivers in the world, and you are going to miss one of the greatest opportunities of your life, because if that harbor is not taken care of the river will cut out the banks gradually and not only destroy Maunie but will widen the bed of the river so that navigation will be destroyed. A stitch in time saves nine is an old proverb, and I recommend it in this instance, and I trust that this committee will profit by adopting its virtues, because the Wabash River is destined to play an important part in the commerce of the great Mississippi Valley. The time will come when the Wabash, the beautiful Wabash, will be improved, and your cities will find a rich harvest of wheat, corn, cattle, sheep, and hogs coming from southern Illinois to the sunny South by cheap water transportation to feed your hungry people. You ought to support this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

[By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. FOWLER to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph with reference to the Ohio River, from line 19, page 26, down to and including line 2, page 27.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph beginning with line 19, page 26, and ending with line 2, on page 27.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the preceding item agreed upon without opposition was for improving and maintaining open-channel work, Ohio River, $684,000, to which there can be no possible objection by any Member; but there may be some question as to this item of $5,000,000. I want to call the attention of the committee to the status of the Ohio River, on which over $16,000,000 has already been appropriated for the slack water; over $18,000,000 toward a new system of dams; leaving about $45,000,000 more to be appropriated for this system of 53 locks on the Ohio River. I have spoken on this subject once or twice before in the House, and I do not intend to repeat anything along that line at this time, because I realize it is too large a proposition to even touch upon. I wish, however, to answer, or, rather, call the attention of the committee to the remark of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BARCHFELD] the other day, wherein he said:

To-day we have a cheaper rate from Pittsburgh to New Orleans by rail than they have from Birmingham, Ala., to New Orleans by rail, only made possible by the great and mighty Ohio.

Believing there might be something to it, although it was a surprising condition of affairs, I called up the Interstate Commerce Commission and ascertained from the traffic department that on soft coal—we were discussing soft coal at the time—the rate from Pittsburgh to New Orleans is $4.45 per ton, which of course is prohibitive, whereas the rate from Birmingham to New Orleans is $1.25. We find that about 1,000,000 tons of coal were shipped down the Ohio River to New Orleans and several hundred thousand tons to St. Louis last year. That is in the last report we have, which goes to show that about 1,000,000 tons, or a little less than that, went to New Orleans, but all the rest of the coal used at New Orleans came from Birmingham and other adjacent points. We have spent about $10,000,000 on the Black Warrior River and its connecting links which bring coal to New Orleans from Alabama. The question for us to determine is whether or not there is any object in having the Government improve the Ohio River for the purpose of making increased competition between Pittsburgh to New Orleans and Birmingham to New Orleans when the Government is the party in interest at all times and pays the bills. Coal can be brought from Pittsburgh 2,000 miles down the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers through 53 locks which are proposed to be put into operation by the $80,000,000 to be expended, and which makes it practically prohibitive on that traffic, according to river men. Coal can not be profitably put through 53 locks, according to such authority. I wish to call attention to the expensive obstacle we are building through these 53 locks, and in addition to show where the coal from Pennsylvania does go. This last year something over 11,000,000 tons were shipped across the State of Ohio to Ashtabula, or one of the Lake ports, and from there up to the Duluth-Superior Harbor and from there distributed throughout the upper country, first across the State of Ohio by rail, over to the lake, and then on an 800-mile haul up to Duluth and Superior. In that country they depend very largely upon the coal which comes from the Pittsburgh district. The proposition was presented to us the other day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the people of Pittsburgh proposed to put through a $60,000,000 canal from Pittsburgh to Lake Erie. I take it we need have no apprehension that private parties will enter into such a proposition. That will be another project for the Government to prosecute. I have been unable to ascertain from any of the reports in reference to this $60,000,000 canal, but the Government surely will be called upon to make that appropriation if it ever goes into operation——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FREAR. I ask for five minutes more. I explained to the Chairman I did not intend to talk on the preceding item for that reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FREAR. At the present time we are building 53 locks, according to the report. Thirty-one locks have been commenced; 22 more locks are to be built. If there is traffic upon that river sufficient to warrant the expenditure of $80,000,000 or $100,000,000, of course no man can question but that that is a proper expenditure. The question of traffic does enter strongly into this problem. I have examined, so far as I have been able, all the engineers' reports; and I have consulted with river men familiar with the Ohio, and I have a number of letters to the effect that I am right in my position that this is an extravagant project. I have consulted with men who run on the Ohio River, and they express to me substantially the same opinion expressed by the reports as to the actual commerce on the Ohio. The traffic that goes through the Portland & Louisville Canal and through the open river at that point is a little over a million tons annually, and passing out of the Ohio at Cairo is a little over a million tons, so the through traffic amounts to about 1,000,000 tons. The engineer says that the river commerce reaches over 8,000,000 tons in the total, which amount is presumably arrived at by duplications. There is no criticism of the engineers for their failure to get exact data. All the reports are unsatisfactory, and after all the expenditures we have made on the Ohio—already reaching over $33,000,000—it occurs to me we ought to know what we are going up against. If we are going to ship only a million tons of coal annually on this river, and this coal will have to go through 53 locks, we had better build a railroad down to New Orleans, if the coal has to go there, and ship the coal at Government expense. It would be far more economical.

Mr. CALLAWAY. What on earth do we want to prepare to ship coal from Pittsburgh to New Orleans for, when it is cheaper for them to ship it from Birmingham? They say they can get it cheaper than in any place on earth there, and now they prefer to ship it down from Pittsburgh.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman is right. My purpose in bringing this before the House is to show the questionable character of the proposition.

It was suggested to me a few moments ago by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES], on a preceding item, that I was standing alone on these propositions. I will suggest to him in that case that if he will read from the congressional reports he will find that the Big Sandy River has been repeatedly criticized by men in this and the other House. I do not stand alone. I am using the engineers' report to ascertain what the facts may be.

I am not going to take the time of the committee further. I have discussed the Ohio River question before. I am not going to worry you with statistics, as I realize it would be useless. I present this brief statement to the House in order to have a vote on it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take up sufficient time of the committee to get in the RECORD a letter I received a few months ago from Gen. Kingman, Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, in regard to commerce on the Ohio River. I do not care to take up the time of the committee to read the entire letter at this time, but will only refer to the second paragraph. It says:

As to the reason for reporting the statistics at only six locks, it may be stated that the particular locks were selected with a view to obtaining as complete statistics as possible—

It appears they only report the statistics at six locks, and not at the entire number of locks on the river.

And at the same time to eliminate duplication as much as practicable. Boats with through tows are required to report only at the first lock through which they pass. The item for open river commerce is the local commerce carried on between the various locks and dams.

That will explain some of the questions that have arisen when this matter was up for discussion. I ask unanimous consent to print the entire letter with my remarks just here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] asks unanimous consent to print the letter referred to as a part of his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, July 27, 1914.

Hon. S. M. SPARKMAN,
Chairman Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
United States House of Representatives.

SIR: 1. Referring to the statement of the commercial statistics of the Ohio River, telephoned to you sometime since, I have the honor to inform you that a report just received from the district officer states that the commercial statistics which he reported by telegraph have been found upon careful check to have contained some duplication. A corrected tabular statement of the statistics is herewith.

2. As to the reason for reporting the statistics at only six locks, it may be stated that the particular locks were selected with a view to obtaining as complete statistics as possible, and at the same time to eliminate duplication as much as practicable. Boats with through tows are required to report only at the first lock through which they pass. The item for open river commerce is the local commerce carried on between the various locks and dams.

Very respectfully,

DAN C. KINGMAN,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Mr. LIEB. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors I wish to voice my approval of the bill which is up for consideration. I concur in the remarks of my colleague [Mr. SPARKMAN], chairman of this committee, who has very ably set forth the worthy features of the bill. As he has stated, the committee drew up a very conservative bill, it being the desire not to ask for any legislation calling for expenditure of Government money which is not absolutely necessary. Having in view the European war, which has had its effects in this country, the committee provided in its report for no new projects. The proposed expenditure calls only for continuing work already authorized and inaugurated by Congress.

It is my intention to speak in particular in regard to the Ohio River, but before proceeding to this phase of the question I want to mention a certain ridiculous contention of ill-informed critics of this legislation. In addition to calling the bill "pork," they go so far as to assert that there is a national lobby, as if to say there are dark and unseen plots being concocted; that there is a vicious propaganda of some sort; that supporters of river and harbor legislation are enemies of real safety and of navigation itself. These are pretty rash statements, but they are unfounded and designed as a cheap method of diverting the attention of well-meaning persons from a worthy cause.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN "LOBBY" AND MERITORIOUS SUPPORT.

Once every year there is a meeting of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress and the Ohio Valley Improvement Association, as well as other organizations whose purpose is purely to boost the cause of improvement. Taken into a collective body, the members of these organizations would represent the great majority of the congressional districts of the country. Take, for example, my district. The people down there are interested in the improvement of the Ohio River. They select delegates to these annual conventions, who travel sometimes a thousand miles to assert their interest in the Government's fixed policy for river and harbor improvement. At the last meeting there came from Evansville, the metropolis of my section of the Ohio River, the mayor, city engineer, city attorney, the editor of the leading Democratic newspaper in Indiana, besides two delegates representing the Evansville Business Association and the Evansville Manufacturers' Association. Now, it is an annual custom for the city municipality of Evansville and the various commercial organizations to foot the bill for traveling expenses and hotel bills of these delegates, and while this custom has been in vogue for many years there never has been a dissenting voice raised by anyone. Why? Because they consider the money is well spent, as do the people of other localities who realize that the improvement of rivers and harbors is bound to bring prosperity and business to the doors of the manufacturer, laborer, merchant, and professional man. Since I have been in Congress and a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee I have never had a protest from one of my constituents; and in this connection I want to say that two of my six counties do not touch upon a navigable river.

CRITICS JUGGLE FIGURES AND WHITTLE WOOD.

Mr. Speaker, I am willing to stake my judgment on the opinions of the business and other men of my community who foresee vast benefits from river improvement rather than give heed to the silly arguments of critics who juggle figures to suit their lame arguments and whittle wood when there is no river and harbor bill up for consideration. I venture to say some of these critics never saw a real steamboat plying one of our rivers and could not give a description of a coal barge without consulting an encyclopedia. And yet some of these men will go out to their districts and applaud the Panama Canal without stopping to think that one of the principal objects of the canal was to promote our commerce and that our greatest river system will carry thousands upon thousands of tons of commerce annually, with the Panama Canal and Pacific coast the goal. It might also be well for me to repeat what I said in the last session of Congress, and that is that the tonnage of freight shipments on the Ohio River is equal to what it will be through the Panama Canal when it is in full operation and with world-wide business on a normal basis.

Mr. Chairman, worthy things in this country have always been the subject of ridicule; our greatest inventions and innovations have been laughed at; and it is but history repeated when critics rise up to oppose the completion of works already begun and in which has been invested too much to warrant our withdrawal.

The steamboat back in 1807 was known as the "fool's fire ship," and became the butt of all sensible people in Europe as well as in America. Victor Hugo remarks that—

In the year 1807, when the first steamboat of Fulton, commanded by Livingston, furnished with one of Watt's engines sent from England and maneuvered, besides her ordinary crew, by two Frenchmen only—André Michaux and another—made her first voyage from New York to Albany, it happened that she set sail on the 17th of August. The ministers took up this important fact, and in numberless chapels preachers were heard calling down a malediction on the machine and declaring that this number 17 was no other than the total of the 10 horns and 7 heads of the beasts in the apocalypse. In America they invoked against the steamboat the beast from the Book of Revelation; in Europe, the reptile of the Book of Genesis. The savants had rejected steamboats as impossible, the priests had condemned, and religion consigned them to perdition.

A local preacher selected for his discourse the question of "whether man has the right to make fire and water work together when God had divided them."

There are those who are so outspoken against river and harbor appropriations that the next thing we know they will be calling the locks and dams firebrands and declaring that the 17 members of the Rivers and Harbor Committee who survive the Sixty-third Congress as none other than the total of 10 horns and 7 heads of the beasts in the apocalypse.

Getting back to the Ohio River, I desire to explain that I represent a district which extends on its southern border for 113 miles along the Ohio River.

PROJECT 30 PER CENT COMPLETED.

In 1910 Congress adopted a plan for improving the Ohio River at a cost of about $63,000,000 with the support of President Taft and a board of Army engineers. The act also contained a provision that the work be undertaken with a view to the completion of such improvement within a period of 12 years, and $1,150,000 was appropriated for purchasing sites for locks and dams. This money has all been spent, as authorized for sites, and on most of them construction work has been started. So here we have a cohesive project, started less than five years ago. If the river is to be canalized as specifically authorized in 12 years, or by 1923, there must be consent to annual appropriations in the river and harbor bill to allow the work to proceed. The amount carried in the pending bill for the Ohio River is $5,000,000 in addition to $684,000 for open-channel work. The amount is not excessive, and I believe everyone will admit it would be poor business policy to abandon an extensive project like this when so much has already been invested. In fact, the Government engineers have reported that the project for a 9-foot stage on the Ohio River is a little over 30 per cent completed. Every person should be willing to give a fair trial to the scheme of river canalization, and here is a particular opportunity to show an inclination to see the results and benefits we claim will accrue. Then after the Ohio is canalized, it would be proven whether other projects of a similar nature could be undertaken. If the result should be discouraging it would be well for us to know it. As yet no one can consistently criticize the Ohio River scheme, as it can not be given the acid test until a perpetual navigation is established from the headwaters to the mouth. There are a number of links yet to be welded together, and all criticism directed at the Ohio River now has no true logic capable of serious defense. But there is no pork in the Ohio River and no such construction can be placed, because the project is already authorized, contingent, of course, upon annual appropriations which are necessary. A discontinuance of annual appropriations would not only invalidate our past investments on the project, but undermine the very foundations upon which our business it built; it would leave thousands of dollars' worth of machinery and engineering equipment to rot away on the river banks. Confidence that the Government will carry out that which it has promised has led to a great boom in the Ohio Valley. Such large commercial centers as Cincinnati, Louisville, and Evansville are growing at a phenomenal rate, and this growth began in unusual proportions immediately after Congress had sanctioned a 9-foot stage on the Ohio. Later on I will produce some evidence of the confidence displayed by Evansville, the second largest city in Indiana and fourth city of the Ohio River system, with a population of 100,000.

ENGINEERS MADE EXHAUSTIVE INVESTIGATION.

The Board of Army Engineers which reported favorably on the Ohio River project came to the conclusion that a very extensive traffic in agricultural produce, in lumber, coal, building stones, raw materials of all sorts, and in general manufactures would unquestionably be assured if the Ohio were given a depth of 9 feet throughout the year. These conclusions were reached after many years of exhaustive research, and the Government engineers deserve great credit for the thorough manner in which they investigated the project before reporting to Congress.

Finally they came to the conclusion that if the Ohio were given more reliable navigation there would develop a considerable traffic in the heavy products of iron and steel manufacture. Replies to questions sent out to iron and steel manufacturers along the route by the Board of Army Engineers which investigated the project indicate that they would use the river for the transport of iron, 20 to 25 per cent of their product. Plants in the Pittsburgh district furnish the supply of structural materials to many cities along the Ohio and the lower Mississippi, and the river would be well adapted to the handling of such traffic. Again, the export trade in iron and steel products with the West Indies, Mexico, Central and South America will furnish traffic which will use the Ohio and the lower Mississippi.

TONNAGE FIGURES JUGGLED.

An opponent of the Ohio River has pointed to the tonnage of freight shipments, and by a jugglery of figures has endeavored to create the impression that there has been a decline. The ridiculous impression is given that traffic has fallen off 34 per cent in a few years. Now, I do not know how such figures could be secured, as I have no less authority than the Army engineers for the statement that a contention of this sort is absurd. In making a comparison of the tonnage the critic referred to compares the year 1912 with 1905. In other words, he has taken the last-named year for comparison because it happened to be an unusually busy year on the river—much above the ordinary—which is a poor jugglery of figures. Why not compare 1913 with 1912, when the freight tonnage was 9,814,123 and 8,618,396, respectively? That shows an increase of 13 or 14 per cent, does it not? No; there is no spirit of fairness in this, and when the true facts are brought to light the whole bottom if deceitful contention falls out.

There is a great fluctuation in river tonnage figures from year to year. It is like a wheat crop or cotton crop. Comparisons of annual products do not give evidence of prosperity, but it indicates the condition of weather, whether conducive or nonconducive to large crops. The same with river tonnage. If navigation is permissible for a total of seven months in the year, the tonnage will be greater than if navigation were possible only five or six months in the aggregate.

I wish in this connection to quote a prominent authority, who says:

The Ohio is unusual among American rivers in that it alone has retained a large traffic in recent years. The statistics of water traffic in coal at Cincinnati show that there has been an increase of 6,137,293 bushels in 13 years, the total during the past year being 62,572,000 bushels. Though this increase is comparatively slight, and though the railway tonnage had increased relatively very much faster, the showing of the Ohio as compared with other rivers has, nevertheless, been remarkably good.

Again, the possibilities of an extensive future development of traffic on the Ohio appears much better than it does on any other American river. At its headwaters is situated the great industrial region known as the Pittsburgh district, and along its banks and those of the lower Mississippi are a large number of industrial centers, which carry on an immense trade with the Pittsburgh region. The Ohio, therefore, lies in the direction of a heavy existing traffic and in a region that is certain to develop rapidly in the future. These two reasons—the existence of a large water tonnage at present and the excellent location of the river in reference to trade routes—account for the preference that is being shown the Ohio River project. It may indeed safely be said that if an experiment had to be performed in water transportation the Ohio River was well chosen for the purpose.

In a former address in Congress I stated that business men and the people in general would feel the injurious effect of suspension of improvement for a 9-foot stage from Pittsburgh to Cairo. I can go further than this and say that a serious blow would be dealt the preparations now in progress to accrue immediate benefits from canalization of the river. For instance, in Evansville the business men and others interested in the welfare of the city have such faith in the project that they have set afoot steps to provide enormous terminal facilities to meet the demands that will follow a rejuvenated river traffic. The following article clipped from the Evansville Daily Courier is significant of the current activities for preparing for a revival of river trade:

REVIEW PORT PLAN OF MAYOR—COMMITTEE TO-MORROW WILL CONSIDER POSSIBILITY OF MUNICIPALITY BUILDING TERMINAL.

The plans of Mayor Bosse for the city will be taken up at a meeting of the port commission committee Saturday afternoon at the E. B. A. Building. Chairman W. S. French yesterday notified the committee. At the last mass meeting the mayor announced that he believed the matter might be handled through the city, or at least that the city might appoint a preliminary commission to investigate the subject. The committee will listen to the suggestions of the mayor and consider them with reference to further action in the movement to secure port facilities.

At the meeting a call will be issued for volunteer delegates to attend the conference at St. Louis January 19, at which plans for getting ready to meet the coming river improvement will be discussed by representatives from every city on the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to Cairo and from Minneapolis to New Orleans on the Mississippi.

"The question of how cities may best handle port construction will be the principal topic of discussion at this conference, and the experience of other cities will be fully reported as a means to future plans," said Mr. French last night. "It is to be hoped that Evansville boosters will attend in considerable numbers, for the conference will be of the utmost value."

Mr. French declared that confidence in the port-commission bill as the best means of port establishment for Evansville has been in no way diminished.

With a deep and uninterrupted river the number of steamboats and barges will multiply a hundredfold, according to a recent statement issued by the Louisville (Ky.) Board of Trade. The cost of a steamboat is large and people will not at present invest money to a great extent in a property that can work only one-half of the time. With open river the year round the boats and barges would quickly come, and shippers would patronize them, for contracts could be made for future deliveries with a knowledge that the river would be open and delivery made. With deep water and uninterrupted navigation from Pittsburgh to New Orleans and the opening of the Panama Canal, Louisville and the whole Ohio Valley can send the products of their factories and fields into good foreign markets.

Uninterrupted river navigation will also undoubtedly bring good results to manufacturers and shippers generally in reducing railroad rates, which in many cases are now too high.

The Ohio alone of all navigable rivers in the United States carries tonnage from its source to its mouth. It drains the richest valley in the civilized world, and the river might be of the greatest possible benefit not alone to the commercial, manufacturing, mining, and agricultural industries of the six States, but of the greatest possible value to the trade and commerce of the United States, and unquestionably the greatest of all feeders to the Panama Canal.

The manufactures of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois in 1910 amounted to $6,948,734,000 in value. Of that total Pennsylvania contributed $2,626,742,000; Illinois, $1,919,277,000; Ohio, $1,437,936,000; Kentucky, $233,754,000; Indiana, $579,075,000; and West Virginia, $161,950,000. The crops of corn, wheat, and hay in one year were of the total farm value of $646,090,621, with other crops in proportion. The wealth of the six States was $25,941,897,242, distributed as follows: Pennsylvania, $9,315,140,116; Illinois, $6,976,476,400; Ohio, $5,019,004,453; Indiana, $2,606,493,004; Kentucky, $1,365,130,718; and West Virginia, $659,652,551. The total wealth of the United States was $88,517,306,775; the six Ohio River States contain approximately one-third of the entire wealth of the country, while the remaining members of the Union, 40 States and Territories, contributed the remaining two-thirds.

HALF OF NATION'S WEALTH IN OHIO RIVER TERRITORY.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, according to the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the six Ohio River States paid into the Federal Treasury not only one full half of all internal revenue collected but $9,000,000 in excess of that full half.

It is a magnificent stream, which during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, carried, according to official reports, 4,270,786 passengers and 9,814,123 tons of freight; a river on whose waters, not always navigable in their unimproved state, the steamer Sprague, the leviathan of western waters, took in safety from Pittsburgh to Cairo and from Cairo to New Orleans in one tow of coal no less than 70,000 tons—a tow of freight which would require not less than 2,333 coal cars, making a train 15 miles in length, not including the locomotive engines required to draw it. It is a river which as much as any other river in the country has demonstrated that it is not present tonnage carried that determines its merits or its standing before the authorities of navigation, but that it is the tonnage-bearing capacity of a stream improved that determines its standing.

RIVERS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

As an indication of the benefits that come from improvement I cite the River Main, of Germany. Founded by the Romans about A. D. 150, in after years the residence of Charlemagne, Frankfort, by the slow growth of centuries, had reached a population in 1880 of some 140,000. Something happened to make a wonderful change in the rate of growth, for Frankfort gained more in the next 20 years than in all the centuries before, and to-day, with the suburbs which lie close around her borders, has a population of nearly 500,000.

The "something" that happened was the canalization of the river, completed in the fall of 1886, which made the Main a part of the Rhine navigation system, and which, while it did not allow ocean vessels to come direct to Frankfort, did enable that city to ship goods all the way by water to or from any port on all the seven seas. The locks have since been lengthened and other improvements made, so that much larger boats can use the river, and Frankfort, which spent some $2,000,000 back in 1886 to equip her harbor, is now spending $17,600,000 on a new and greater harbor to properly care for her swiftly growing trade.

I also refer to the reorganization of the waterway system in Germany from 1875 to 1900, which included, besides the Main, the canalization of the rivers Lower Spree, Fulda, Upper Oder, and the Lower Weser.

Following the inauguration of the new policy traffic rapidly developed from 2,900,000,000 ton kilometers in 1875 to 11,500,000,000 ton kilometers in 1910. Encouraged by this increase of water tonnage the administration passed two important laws in 1904 and 1905 for a still further extension of the waterway net of the country. These laws provide for an outlay of $116,430,200 upon rivers and canals, an amount almost equal to Prussia's entire expenditures upon waterways up to 1904.

RIVERS WOULD BE WAR PROBLEM.

There is a great deal being said nowadays about our preparedness for war. Most of the discussion has been directed to the size and strength of our Army and Navy and our coast defenses; but we hear nothing at all about our inland facilities for transportation in time of a possible war. Should we be plunged into war to-morrow, a week or a month thereafter the fact would unquestionably be brought home, "Our inland waterways have been neglected by the National Government; the Ohio and sometimes the Mississippi Rivers are not navigable during certain seasons of the year." I can now well foresee the suddenness with which this state of affairs would dawn upon the average person. The uses of our rivers during the Civil War and their influence as means of transportation and communication are still fresh in our memories. These uses in a modern war, however, with a foreign nation would not be manifest, for the reason that the circumstances would likely prove vastly different because of more stringent requirements of warfare of to-day, such as the necessities contingent with the use of the Panama Canal and the great western half of the country, which took very little part in the Civil War. The country as it is now constituted never engaged in a war with a world power, and while as a people and nation we are doubtless as well prepared as we ever were, no one can accurately foresee just what an important factor our inland waterways would play in a deadly conflict, which I hope will never come to pass. The subject is at least well worth our serious consideration, and not to be overlooked in connection with our navigation propaganda.

I do not wish to appear to be deviating from my subject, but it would not be amiss to call attention to one particular sidelight of the long struggle in the United States for the reinforcement of our waterways. I refer to Abraham Lincoln, who fought for two great principles. One was for the abolishment of slavery and the other was for river improvement.

Most of Lincoln's early life was interwoven with the pioneer history of our rivers and their commerce. Much of his knowledge was obtained from travel thereon and observation thereof, and, as has been said by one of his biographers:

> All that Abraham Lincoln saw of men and the world outside of Gentryville and its neighborhood until after he was 21 years of age he saw on these rivers. His legislative experience had been of great benefit to him. He had always favored the policy of developing the rivers and the resources of the State by the fostering aid of the local government. His speech in Congress shows he understood the waterway problem, was fully alive to its interests, and realized its needs. Had he lived longer, there is no doubt our rivers and harbors would have found in him a worthy champion.

It was as a youth, while engaged on the river in the humble capacity of flatboat man, that he was brought face to face with the slave question, and it was then that he formed those opinions which in after years became such a potent factor in shaping his life and the destiny of our country.

LINCOLN'S FIRST SPEECH FOR RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Lincoln made his first dollar on the Ohio River, while a resident of the county in which I have lived the greater part of my life. In 1830 Lincoln made his first speech, and in it he discussed waterways. His subject was "Navigation of the Sangamon River." In his first experience as a candidate for office, in 1832, his printed announcement card was devoted mostly to river improvement. He was the pilot who guided the first boat from Cincinnati, via the Ohio, Mississippi, and Illinois Rivers, up the Sangamon. Lincoln was an ardent advocate of all internal improvements, especially the improvement of rivers.

Mr. Speaker, I am positive that if Abraham Lincoln were on the floor to-day he would be fighting for this bill. In support of this contention I quote parts of Lincoln's speech before Congress on June 20, 1848, while he was a Member of the House. I urge that close observation be made of his pertinent remarks, as the criticism to which he made reply was the same criticism that is now being directed against the river and harbor bill. Lincoln defended what some are now inclined to call "pork" in these later days. Lincoln said, in part:

> Do nothing at all lest you do something wrong, is the sum and substance of this message—

Lincoln referred to a message of President Polk against river improvement—> and this, with the exception of what is said about constitutionality, applying as forcibly to making improvements by State authority as by National authority. So that we must abandon the improvements of the country altogether by any and every authority or we may resist and repudiate the doctrines of this message. Let us attempt the latter.

The first position is that a system of internal improvement would overwhelm the Treasury.

That in such a system there is a tendency to undue expansion is not to be denied. Such a tendency is founded in the nature of the subject. A Member of Congress will prefer voting for a bill which contains an appropriation for his district to voting for one which does not; and when a bill shall be expanded till every district shall be provided for, that it will be too greatly expanded is obvious. But is this any more true in Congress than in a State legislature? If a Member of Congress must have an appropriation for his district, so a member of a legislature must have for his county; and if one will overwhelm the State treasury, so the other will overwhelm the National Treasury. Go where we will, the difficulty is the same. Allow it to drive us from the Halls of Congress and it will just as easily drive us from the State legislature.

Let us, then, grapple with it and test its strength.

But suppose, after all, there should be some degree of inequality. Inequality is certainly never to be embraced for its own sake, but is every good thing to be discarded which may be inseparably connected with some degree of it? If so, we must discard all government. The Capitol is built at public expense, for the public benefit; but does anyone doubt that it is of some peculiar local advantage to the property holders and business people of Washington? Shall we remove it for this reason? And if so, where shall we set it down and be free from the difficulty? To make sure of our object, shall we locate it nowhere and leave Congress hereafter to hold its sessions as the loafer lodged "in spots about"?

I make no special allusion to the present President when I say there are few stronger cases in this world of "burden to the many and benefit of the few"—of "inequality"—than the Presidency itself is by some thought to be. An honest laborer digs coal at about 70 cents a day, while the President digs abstractions at about $70 a day. The coal is clearly worth more than the abstractions, and yet what a monstrous inequality in the prices! Does the President for this reason propose to abolish the Presidency? He does not and ought not. The true rule in determining to embrace or reject anything is not whether it have any evil in it, but whether it have more of evil than good.

WHY MAGNIFY OBJECTIONS AND REFUSE TO SEE GOOD?

There are few things wholly equal or wholly good. Almost everything, especially of Government policy, is an inseparable compound of the two, so that our best judgment of the preponderance between them is continually demanded. Of this principle the President, his friends, and the world generally act on most subjects. Why not apply it, then, upon this question? Why, as to improvements, magnify the evil and stoutly refuse to see any good in them?

Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of reviewing this message in the least possible time, as well as for the sake of distinctness, I have analyzed its arguments as well as I could and reduced them to the propositions I have stated. I have now examined them in detail. I wish to detain the committee only a little while longer with some general remarks on the subject of improvements. That the subject is a difficult one can not be denied. Still, it is no more difficult in Congress than in the municipal districts which everywhere exist. All can recur to instances of this difficulty in the case of county roads, bridges, and the like.

One man is offended because a road passes over his land, and another is offended because it does not pass over his; one is dissatisfied because the bridge, for which he is taxed, crosses the river on a different road from that which leads from his house to town; another can not bear that the county should get in debt for these same roads and bridges, while not a few struggle hard to have roads located over their lands, and then stoutly refuse to let them be opened until they are first paid the damages. Now, these are no other than the very difficulties against which and out of which the President constructs his objections of inequality, speculation, and crushing the Treasury. There is but a single alternative about them—they are sufficient out of Congress as well as in it, and there is an end. We must reject them as insufficient or lie down and do nothing by any authority. Then, difficulty though there be, let us meet and overcome it.

"Attempt the end, and never stand to doubt;
Nothing so hard but search will find it out."

Determine that the thing can and shall be done and then we shall find the way. The tendency to undue expansion is unquestionably the chief difficulty. How to do something and still not do too much is the desideratum. Let each contribute his mite in the way of suggestion. The late Silas Wright, in a letter to the Chicago convention, contributed his, which was worth something, and I now contribute mine, which may be worth nothing. At all events, it will mislead nobody, and therefore will do no harm. I would not borrow money. I am against an overwhelming, crushing system. Suppose that at each session Congress shall first determine how much money can for that year be spared for improvements; then apportion that sum to the most important objects. So far all is easy; but how shall we determine which are the most important? On this question comes the collision of interests. I shall be slow to acknowledge that your harbor or your river is more important than mine, and vice versa. To clear this difficulty, let us have that same statistical information which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Vinton] suggested at the beginning of this session. In that information we shall have a stern, unbending basis of facts—a basis in no wise subject to whim, caprice, or local interest. The prelimited amount of means will save us from doing too much, and the statistics will save us from doing what we do in wrong places. Adopt and adhere to this course and, it seems to me, the difficulty is cleared.

One of the gentlemen from South Carolina [Mr. Rhett] very much depreciates these statistics. He particularly objects, as I understand him, to counting all the pigs and chickens in the land. I do not perceive much force in the objection. It is true that if everything be enumerated a portion of such statistics may not be very useful to this object. Such products of the country as are to be consumed where they are produced need no roads or rivers, no means of transportation, and have no very proper connection with the subject. The surplus, that which is produced in one place to be consumed in another; the capacity of each locality for producing a greater surplus; the natural means of transportation and their susceptibility of improvement; the hindrances, delays, and losses of life and property during transportation; and the causes of each would be among the most valuable statistics in this connection.

From these it would readily appear where a given amount of expenditure would do the most good. These statistics might be equally accessible, as they would be equally useful, to both the Nation and the States. In this way and by these means let the Nation take hold of the larger works and the States the smaller ones; and thus working in a meeting direction, directly, but steadily and firmly what is made unequal in one place, may be equalized in another, extravagance avoided, and the whole country put to that career of prosperity which shall correspond with its extent of territory, its natural resources, and the intelligence and enterprise of its people.

Our congressional appropriations for the betterment of inland navigation seem to have been conservatively small when we consider that the United States has spent during the past hundred years in regulating, improving, and extending our system of natural waterways only 4¼ per cent of the amount private capitalists have invested in the construction of railways.

PRICES OF MINERALS GOVERNED BY TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES.

Another phase of river improvement is the possibility—and it is an extremely feasible supposition—that inland transportation on a canalized basis will in the near future assist more materially than we now imagine in our competition with foreign markets. Take, for example, the commodity of fluorspar used extensively in the iron and steel industries. The Kentucky-Illinois district adjacent to the Ohio River is not only the main American source of fluorspar, but is the only one from which spar reaches the general market. Since 1882 the district has produced approximately 350,000 tons of spar, having a total value of $2,000,000.

A statement recently issued by the Geological Survey tends to prove that should a deep waterway facility be provided from these fluorspar fields to Pittsburgh, which is now the greatest market for it, our domestic production would be able to compete with foreign imports. The spar is shipped in part by the Illinois Central Railroad and in part on the Ohio River. Prices are fixed by Pittsburgh quotations, less freight and commission. At Pittsburgh the American spar comes in competition with English and German material imported through New York. The American mines supply the western trade and about half the Pittsburgh demand. The importers control the eastern trade and determine prices at Pittsburgh. Importers have now a slight advantage in the Pittsburgh market on the grade of ore. It is not to be denied that when a steady supply of fluorspar at the present or slightly lower prices can be guaranteed in steel-making centers—and this condition will be assured with the canalization of the Ohio River—the market can be rapidly expanded, and this affords the most hopeful outlook for spar producers. In many ways fluorspar has advantages over other fluxing materials now used.

River business under proper conditions is susceptible of enormous expansion, which must come with increased demand. The simple multiplication of people multiplies demand. "Teeming millions" is a favorite expression of speaker and writer on favorite subjects, and speaking of it as the future population of the Ohio Valley is not hyperbole. The most careless look into the future reveals what an enormous population there is to be served. All past experience teaches that congested centers of population are only possible near waterways of some kind or other. Given slack water on the Ohio River and the city until overlapping enlarged borders cover up the lines of sections and one social and commercial empire comes into existence. This development can, however, only take place after continuous water communication is established. When used in connection with navigation the word "continuous" is one to conjure with. It is the one essential element of future development.

As I have already pointed out, the Ohio Valley is on the alert and is in no way stagnant, and this condition has been manifest in the past five years or so to a particular degree. Evansville is the largest city in my district and is peculiarly susceptible to the influences exerted by the Ohio River. And the great industrial impetus which has taken hold of Evansville in the past five years, and since canalization of the river was authorized by an act of Congress, is a fair sample of the process of rejuvenation fast becoming apparent in other important industrial sections of the river. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, just to correct one inaccuracy, as I take it, on the part of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], I desire to say that in this compilation of statistics of tonnage on the Ohio River since April 1, 1912, there are no duplications, especially so far as the transportation of coal is concerned. The coal that passes down the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers is taken notice of and the amount reported only at one of those six places that are designated by the Board of Engineers to obtain statistics. There is no duplication whatever under the new system. The duplications that were referred to the other day were those that occurred prior to April 1, 1912, and not since.

On Saturday last I made a brief statement of the result of the investigation by the Government engineers of 354 improved rivers and harbors of the country, with a view of ascertaining whether the commerce thereon was increasing or decreasing, and the cost of such commerce per ton at a reasonable interest charge on the original investment, plus the annual maintenance cost of such improved waterways.

My statement of the result as to the cost per ton is inaccurate in that I used the term "ton-mile" at so many mills, when I should have stated "tons" regardless of the number of miles transported, at so many cents per ton. I therefore desire to restate the result of this investigation so as to have my statement read:

"Of 354 rivers and harbors investigated by the Government engineers, the improvement of which cost $506,671,600, on a 3 per cent investment would give a cost of 2$\frac{1}{10}$ cents per ton for freight transported thereover. The maintenance charge against these waterways for the year 1912 was $9,248,900, or an annual maintenance charge of 1$\frac{8}{10}$ cents per ton, thus making a total cost of 3$\frac{9}{10}$ cents per ton for all the commerce borne on the waterways investigated for the year 1912, regardless of whether the same was transported one mile, a hundred miles, or a thousand miles.

"The original tonnage of these waterways when their improvement was first commenced amounted to 278,460,700 tons annually. The tonnage of the same for the year 1907 was 648,026,900 tons, and for the year 1912 it was 722,885,400 tons, showing a large increase of tonnage in place of a decrease, so far as the Government engineers have been able to investigate. The 354 improved rivers and harbors do not include some of the largest commerce-bearing harbors—for instance, Boston and New Orleans."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows.:

St. Marys River, at the falls, Michigan: Continuing improvement by the construction of a fourth lock, $500,000: Provided, That so much as may be necessary of the unexpended balance of appropriations heretofore made for the construction of the new third lock may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be applied to the construction of the fourth lock and to the deepening and enlargement of the tailrace of the United States power plant, in order to increase the capacity of said plant.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, a short time ago, in the discussion of the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to strike out a paragraph, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR], referring to the State of Michigan and its experience with the building of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, said, in substance, that the State of Michigan became bankrupt on account of it, and that it had to be taken over by the Federal Government. Upon interruption, the gentleman from Alabama said he was basing his statement about the bankruptcy of the State upon his memory of something that he had read a number of years ago. I questioned the statement at the time.

Since then I have taken occasion to review my history of Michigan and the connection of the State with the building of the canal. I find that the State of Michigan never attempted to construct a canal where the Sault Ste. Marie Canal now is on its own responsibility and with its own capital except in the early history of the State. At that time it authorized a survey, but was prevented from going ahead with the project by Federal officers. Its contractors were driven off of the territory by a detachment from the Federal Army under an order of the War Department. The Federal authorities questioned the right of the State to construct the canal, claiming that the United States had jurisdiction over the territory on account of having a military reservation there.

That was soon after the State was admitted into the Union. After that the Representatives in Congress and the Senators from the State of Michigan took the question up from time to time. They introduced several bills in the National Congress, trying to get the Federal Government to take the project over and make an appropriation to build the canal. Finally in 1852 the National Government gave the State 750,000 acres of land within the boundaries of the State. From the proceeds of the sale of that land the State was to build a canal. The State legislature accepted the grant, appointed a commission of five, made a contract with private parties to construct the canal, and the canal was constructed by those parties in the time specified in the grant and from the proceeds derived from the sale of the land. At no time was the credit of the State of Michigan brought into question on account of the building of the canal.

Mr. Chairman, in the work entitled "Jubilee Annals of the Lake Superior Canal, the World's Greatest Artificial Waterway," compiled by Sarah V. E. Harvey, I find this interesting statement of the history of the building of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal:

The earliest promoting measure dates back to 1837, and the progress of the same for the next 15 years is briefly stated in a folder recently published by the Citizens' Association of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., from which the following extracts were made:

"The first official action on record with regard to the canal on the American side of the outlet of Lake Superior was that of the governor of Michigan in his message to the first legislature convened in 1837—the State having been admitted into the Union the previous year—wherein he advocated the building of the canal by the State, with the result that a law was passed at that session providing for a survey of the same.

"The engineer in charge reported to the governor, recommending dimensions for the canal to be 75 feet wide and 10 feet deep, and for two locks of same depth, each with 9-foot lift, 32 feet wide, and 100 feet long, and estimating the total cost at $112,544. In 1839 a law was passed authorizing certain State commissioners to contract for the canal of the size mentioned, and work was commenced during the spring of that year. But as the canal traversed a United States military reservation, and the Federal authorities had not approved of the undertaking, the officer in command, acting under orders from Washington, marched a detachment of soldiers onto the ground, ejected the contractors, and caused all further canal work to cease.

"The Legislature of Michigan at its next session passed a resolution protesting against the ejectment and demanding reparation from Congress, but without result. In 1840 a bill was introduced into Congress in accordance with a memorial from the Michigan Legislature, asking for an appropriation of 100,000 acres of land, but Henry Clay, the famous orator and leading statesman, made a speech against it as, to quote his words, 'a work beyond the remotest settlement in the United States, if not in the moon,' and the measure was defeated.

"In 1843 the Michigan Legislature by resolution invoked the aid of the Legislatures of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and Wisconsin in jointly promoting favorable action by Congress for the canal, but without avail. Similar proceedings followed in 1844–1848–49, but proved futile. Finally, as the result of the strenuous efforts by prominent citizens in the Great Lakes region, stimulated by the profitable development of mining enterprises on the south shore of Lake Superior, Congress passed an act on August 21, 1852, granting 750,000 acres of land to the State of Michigan to aid in building the canal."

The building of the canal was started in June, 1853, and completed in May, 1855.

Mr. Chairman, I did not want the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR] to go unchallenged. I desired to call the attention of the committee briefly to the history of the building of this canal and to the fact that the credit of the State of Michigan was never called in question on account of it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I withdraw my request, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Harbor at Ashland, Wis.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $20,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Last year when we were discussing the river and harbor bill it was frequently stated that in our State we had very little water traffic and that I knew little about the subject, all of which, so far as it related to myself, I am willing to admit; but in regard to the water traffic of the State, there are several items here, and if any of them are not warranted in staying in the bill it is up to the committee to defend them. I have no defense I feel impelled to offer to anything. But to show the character of some of these items briefly I call attention to the one which has just been read. In 1913 the commerce of Ashland carried by water was 5,623,309 tons, carried for a distance of about 600 miles. In addition to that commerce was 18,131,000 feet of lumber that was not included. The engineers do not include lumber, logs, or things of that kind which are rafted in. They are not considered with the commerce apparently, nor do the engineers include them in their report. With that Ashland commerce there were 57,000 passengers carried to or from this particular place.

Wisconsin has a large number of harbors, and three of them contribute the following commerce to the country: Superior and Duluth, one harbor, 46,875,000 tons; Milwaukee, 8,647,000 tons; Ashland, which has just been read, 5,623,000 tons; a total of 61,245,000 tons for these three harbors, which are only a few of the harbors of the State.

It has been suggested that there was no river of any importance up in that country. I have stated before that the greatest river in the world flows past my district for 100 miles. A large river, averaging over half a mile in width, and capable of floating at all seasons of the year, when it is open, the largest boats on the Mississippi River, is opposite my home. Years ago we had more traffic there by far than there is on the Ohio River to-day; in fact, more than was carried on the Mississippi. To-day we have practically no traffic at all. There were shipped last year 219,000 tons at a valuation of $1,170,000. That looks big. It is just as large as the average Florida project, but a gentleman who sat at the table with me at my home is the man who ran practically all that commerce, which consisted of logs and timber that was rafted. We do not count traffic which floats down in rafts. It is not like other traffic. It floats on the present stage of water.

One other thing: Gentlemen say, "You have no projects which you have been importuned not to oppose." That is a mistake. Since I have been here a gentleman who is a member of a State waterway commission, the only one appointed in my State, came here in behalf of an $8,000,000 proposition to go past my own home along this river; the chairman of that waterway commission, appointed by the governor of Wisconsin, was from my home town. But I would not be inconsistent. The Army engineers refused to approve the project. I said, "Let them determine after a thorough investigation." It has been suggested frequently, Mr. Chairman, that I do not know what pressure is brought to bear on Members. I surely do, and we all do. It all comes back to this, that we are continually pressed on these projects, and I have been asked to give way, just as other Members are continually pressed to give way, and have refused to be placed in an inconsistent position. I believe the engineers should be relieved from political pressure and that projects should be determined on their merits.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like to ask the gentleman whether there are any items in this rivers and harbors bill for Wisconsin that he objects to?

Mr. FREAR. I do not know; I am going to speak of one or two.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the gentleman seek to evade my question by saying that he does not know, but that he is going to speak on one or two?

Mr. FREAR. I have not made a careful investigation except in one case, and that I shall speak about.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Harbor at Racine, Wis.: For maintenance, $10,400; continuing improvement in accordance with the reports submitted in House Document No. 62, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, and in the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, $167,400; in all, $177,800.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not know just what is the intention of my colleague [Mr. FREAR] in regard to this particular proposition, but as his attitude has been a little bit threatening I thought I would anticipate any hostile effort that he might be disposed to make, by calling the attention of the committee to the facts.

The first harbor project for Racine was adopted in 1843. Like all—I think, all—projects for harbors on the west shore of Lake Michigan, it contemplated simply two piers extending from the mouth of the river, parallel with each other, out into the lake. From the first time work was done on that project there was serious trouble with the harbor, storms from the northeast driving the water between the piers and up the river, often making it impossible for vessels to remain anchored in the stream or fastened to the docks along its sides. Congress tried to prevent this recurring trouble by making various modifications of the project of 1843, which project as thus modified was completed in 1905. But the trouble still continued, the water being driven up the river with such violence during storms that vessels unloading at wharves nearly a mile from the harbor entrance would pound up and down, break hawsers, tear out piling, and smash docks. Finally, in 1907, Congress adopted a new project—the existing project—which provides for the tearing out of both the north and the south pier and the building of what is known as an arrowhead harbor, to consist of a north breakwater and a south breakwater, having their lake ends about 200 feet apart and opposite from and 2,000 feet from the mouth of the river, and from these points extending to the shore. Two years later Congress, on the recommendation of the Government engineers, provided for the construction of only the north half of this new project—that is, for tearing out only the north pier and building only the north breakwater. This Congress did, as the act expressly declared, because it desired to see whether, on the completion of the north half of the arrowhead project, experience would not demonstrate that there was no necessity for constructing the other half. Accordingly the north pier was torn out and the north breakwater completed; but in December, 1913, the first severe storm demonstrated that the harbor was in the very worst condition it had ever been in. I was at home during that storm and saw some of its effects along the river.

Here is a letter written to me shortly after the storm by the captain of a vessel:

RACINE, WIS., November 12, 1913.

Hon. H. A. COOPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to state that on November 6 I arrived in Racine at 4 a. m. loaded with 2,826 tons of hard coal consigned to the Carroll Coal Co. The weather being fine I arrived at the Carroll Coal Co. dock at 7.30 and ready to start unloading. I started unloading at 8 a. m. and continued unloading Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, and on Saturday noon it started to blow quite hard from the northeast, and continued increasing. At 4 a. m. Sunday all hands were called on deck to get out more lines as considerable sea had made and steamer started parting her lines, caused by the undertow. We worked continually from that time until Monday afternoon when the wind shifted to the westward, which caused the sea to moderate.

We parted every working line we had several times, then we got out our 9½-inch brand new hawser. We got two parts out of each end of the boat, in which she snapped like shoestrings. After using up 1,000 feet of our hawser or, in fact, the whole line, we could do nothing but start working our engine. We had made junk of $650 worth of lines and we had no more, so we started working our engine ahead and astern. About every five minutes, as our steamer would rush ahead, we would back the engine, and when she would rush astern would work ahead.

Remember, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that this occurred at a point in the river, up in the city, nearly 1 mile from the end of the harbor piers.

All this time we lay in the middle of the river and did not know what moment our steamer would rush into the bridge ahead of us. All this time our anchor was down on the bottom, but would drag wherever she went. I must also say that the Carroll Coal Co. dock is three-fourths of a mile from the mouth of the river and around a bend, and that at normal stage of water their docks are between 4 and 5 feet above water, and must say that the sea rolled at least 2 feet over the docks, causing our steamer to roll and pound, in which we were afraid that our rudder and shoe would be damaged. On Monday morning, while we were still in the midstream, I called Mr. George T. Caystile, manager of the Carroll Coal Co., and asked him to call our agent, D. Sullivan & Co., Chicago, on long-distance phone and ask him to send us 120 fathoms of 6½-inch new line by express in order to have something to tie our steamer up to the dock with. This arrived at 3 p. m. Monday afternoon and cost us $145 more. By 6 o'clock Monday afternoon we were once more alongside of the dock.

Under the conditions at Racine at present I hope I never will be asked to fetch another load there, and think that after our owner received my letter stating conditions here I am satisfied they will not send us here again unless conditions are improved.

(Signed) GEO. A. MONTGOMERY,
Captain of the steamer "Nyanza."

I have here also two other letters, one from the captain of one of the Goodrich Line of steamers, the other from the captain of the steamer J. H. Wade. Both of these letters I will insert in the RECORD.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I want to ask if a provision for this harbor was not carried in the bill that was fought to its death in the Senate or in the House, several Members claiming credit for defeating the bill?

Mr. COOPER. Yes; this provision for Racine passed the House and went to the Senate. It was included in the bill presented as a substitute to the Senate by Senator BURTON, the senior Senator from Ohio, who fought without mercy some items in the House bill. It was also included in the bill reported to the Senate by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. SIMMONS. Never on the floor of either Senate or House has there been a word said against the provision for the harbor of Racine.

Racine has a populatfon of about 45,000 people. No city of its size in the Nation surpasses it as a manufacturing center. Its products go to all parts of the world. The receipts of the post office at Racine last year were more than $400,000. The business in and out of its harbor amount to about $7,000,000 annually. Its harbor is in miserable condition, and the provision for its completion ought to be enacted into law with the least possible delay.

RACINE, WIS., November 11, 1913.

W. C. RICHARDSON & Co., Cleveland, Ohio.

DEAR SIRS: On November 9, 1913, steamer J. H. Wade, lying at Racine Gas Co.'s dock, well moored, wind northwest fresh, 4 a. m. same date. Wade began to race or range at moorings when all hands were called on deck to watch lines and main engine ordered ready for immediate use. At 7 a. m. the ship's hawser was put out with long lead and bights and main engine started ahead slow to hold steady strain on lines. Wind veering alternately from northeast to north, blowing gale. Wade laboring hard at lines, piles, and dock, and I went up the river to investigate conditions, if it became necessary to move, and found channel badly congested with steamer Nyanza, barges, derrick scows, tugs, etc., all laboring hard at their moorings, and no piles on dock and no place for us to lay, and I realized it would be hazardous for us to start up river, so decided to hang on at Gas Dock if possible. About noon the ship started to raise and dip with the swells and bump the bottom, when I decided to try and flood her and sink her to the bottom, but after filling all water compartments, including forepeak and booby tank, the seas would still lift her and cause her to bump and range, and after going through all our lines, including our 9½-inch lake hawser and breaking piles on dock, I had to move some place, and started up river at 4.30 p. m. with intention of going through the east draw at Fourth Street Bridge and shoving her on the bottom just as far as she would go, navigating the congested channel as slowly as possible. Reaching the approach of Fourth Street Bridge without any mishap, when I blew signal for draw two different times upon approach to same, bridge tender saying to me I couldn't get through the bridge and he wouldn't open the draw, when I said "I wanted the draw, and I might have to open it for you." There being a loose derrick scow, unmanned, bumping by my stern so I couldn't handle the ship to the best advantage, and in effort to keep off the bridge, with scow bumping by stern and riding onto us, and two tugs Alice and Hyttle lay at Pugh's dock, I could not work her into the approach at starboard draw, so the derrick scow of Grieling Bros. Co., Green Bay City, drove out stern over on C., M. & St. P. R. R. dock, crushing the dock. Our stern overhanging the dock and blocking traffic on railroad track, I then got red lantern and stood by to signal trains and blew danger signal and distress signal for help and sent a man down for harbor master and life-saving crew, latter responding, and I asked them to see if they could get the draw open and get the two tugs out of the way and I would try to hang on to the derrick scow alongside of us and hold him from going through the bridge. After the tugs were moved from Pugh's dock and Louise M from starboard approach to bridge, and I couldn't get bridge open, I worked the derrick scow around our stem and on port side of us and hung onto him all night and until noon Monday, being necessary to watch the lines continually so she wouldn't go through them. I worked our nose up to starboard approach of bridge and again filling forward compartments and forepeak with water so we wouldn't get into bridge, and kept main engine working from slow to nearly full speed ahead continuously and steering ship to keep stem in midstream, also having one line out aft to help hold until 3 p. m. November 10, when the seas subsided enough to stop the engine, and at 7 a. m. November 11 I backed down to unloading dock, getting there at 10.30 a. m.

Damage done and sustained. Damage Wade suffered by bumping on bottom unknown; damage to lines and hawser, a thousand feet parted, strained, and chewed up. Stern rammed several times by scow, apparently little damage done; port quarter fender wale chewed off and plate indented.

Wade stemed Fourth Street Bridge closed draw, breaking one 1 foot by 2 inch pine joist under walk and loosening three sidewalk boards.

Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. dock sustained damage from our port quarter, caused by derrick scow of Grieling Bros. loose and unmanned, ramming our stern, and causing us to override the dock, breaking one dock stringer, oak 12 feet by 10 inches by 12 inches, and 12 retainer timbers, pine 12 feet by 12 inches by 12 inches, spiked on top of piling. At gas dock we pulled up or broke off one pile entirely, broke one more, loosening several others, and ripped off 36 feet of dock stringer, oak 12 feet by 8 inches by 10 inches.

Damage done to fish tug Louise M, owned by Louis Krueger, who I asked to move from his moorings, and he did, and in moving or after he moved he bumped or overrode the dock, doing damage to his rail, for which he claims damage from city for not opening the draw so Wade could have gotten on through other draw, thereby not disturbing him from his moorings.

There was much other damage done to craft and docks, one barge sinking in river from pounding on docks, steamer Nyanza loosening piles and chewing up $650 worth of lines; fish tugs rammed and docks tore up; scows battered and punctured; docks undermined by backset; and much property loss.

The conditions of the inside of the harbor here in a north gale are quite unbelievable and not a safe harbor for craft.

Yours, truly,

C. W. WILLETT, Master.

OFFICE OF THE GOODRICH TRANSIT CO.,
Chicago, Ill., January 20, 1914.

Hon. HENRY A. COOPER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. COOPER: The Goodrich Transit Co., owning dock property at Racine, Wis., operates steamboats between Chicago, Milwaukee, and Racine, two boats making the harbor at Racine daily; in other words, they go in and out of Racine Harbor 600 or more times every year.

It has often happened when a gale was blowing and heavy sea running, that after going into Racine Harbor and making landing at their dock, boats are unable to discharge or receive cargo on account of the severe undertow which makes the boats range up and down the dock, breaking piles and lines, endangering lives of freight handlers, and destroying gangplanks.

The foregoing conditions make it necessary to leave Racine Harbor without accomplishing the purpose of discharging and receiving cargo. In such event it becomes necessary for boats to carry Racine cargo to Chicago or Milwaukee, returning to Racine and landing the goods when weather conditions permit.

The writer is familiar with the plans for proposed extension of Arrowhead Breakwater, and sincerely hopes that appropriation be authorized and work proceed at earliest possible date.

Yours, respectfully,

GOODRICH TRANSIT CO.,
By DAVID M. COCHRANE, Supt.

That storm convinced the United States engineer in charge that the arrowhead project for Racine Harbor ought forthwith to be completed. Accordingly, in 1913 that engineer recommended the prompt building of the south half, and that recommendation was approved by the Chief of Engineers. A similar arrowhead project was completed a few years ago at Manitowoc in my State and has proven a perfect success.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fox River, Wis.: Continuing improvement from Depere up to Portage, including maintenance of improvement of Wolf River and of the harbors heretofore improved on Lake Winnebago, $20,000. And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to convey, by quit-claim deed, to the State of Wisconsin, or to the city of Portage free of cost, all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the "Portage Levee," including the right of way on which it is built, whenever the proper authorities of said State, or of said city, shall satisfy the Secretary of War that they are empowered by law to accept the same.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to state in passing, in reference to the project which I was asked to support, and in the discussion of which I refused to take part, which I mentioned a while ago, I believe that project is far more advantageous to the Government than many of those that we have been discussing, but the projects that we have here represent almost eighteen million tons, and they receive only $277,000. On this item the question has been asked as to the character of the project, and I happen to know a little bit about it and will state what it is, although it is not for the purpose of defending it. If you have any questions to ask, let the gentleman who comes from that district look after it. That is the usual procedure—not for the committee, but for the one who is more particularly interested in the project to look after it. One hundred and thirty-four thousand six hundred and forty-eight tons is the amount of commerce on the Fox River project, which calls for $20,000, but the part to which I wish to address myself particularly, is that which refers to the Portage Levee.

Many years ago the Government gave to the Green Bay & Mississippi Canal Co. a right of way, and a land grant with it, for the purpose of building the canal at that point. It had the effect of taking out some of the very finest timberland over in my own county, 200 miles distant from the Fox River. They took some of the finest timberland in the State under the Government land grant, and they built this canal. There was some traffic on it for a time and then it was abandoned. There is practically no use for this upper canal. The lower Fox River has a large business, of course, for on it there are all of the great paper mills of the Northwest. But the canal proper stands there, elevated away above the surrounding country, built by that private company with moneys which came from the sale of the lands received by land grant, and the Government desires to turn over to the State this canal. For six years I was the chairman of the State commission that would have had to take the deed, and we refused to take it. We do not want it notwithstanding the Government has put it there. The State is now asked to take care of it, and as I said the embankments are far above the level of the surrounding country. The State is appropriating money constantly to keep up those levees. It is a continual menace to that part of the country. That is the situation and that frequently is the case with these canals. No one wants them, and they are of no value to anyone so far as that part of the country is concerned. The State does not want to take it, and if you refuse to give the power I am sure there will be no regrets expressed.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has not objected to a single item embraced in the bill covering his own State.

Mr. FREAR. Is there anyone on the floor who does? They are all meritorious. I said they represent a commerce of 14,000,000 tons. I should be very glad to answer——

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman suggested, when he was first asked the question whether or not they were meritorious, that he was not thoroughly apprised of their merits or demerits.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not saying that they are not meritorious.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman object to the item of $15,000 for maintenance of the outer harbor at Milwaukee, which has a commerce of more than 8,600,000 tons? Does the gentleman object to these other items of maintenance?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not objecting to any of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are all meritorious.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And I am not saying that they are not meritorious. I am calling the attention of this House to the basis of the criticism of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. He objects to nearly every item in every other State, but does not object to a single item in his own State. [Applause.] I call further attention to the fact that the only objection he made was a pro forma one, when he moved to strike out the last word of the last sentence, in order that he might voice his approval of the items of his own State.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I can not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am very sorry the gentleman can not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no controversy with the gentleman who has just risen, and I do not mean to be discourteous to him. I have only five minutes and I very seldom occupy the floor of this House. Taking the Fox River, Wis., appropriation, for example—not that I disapprove of it, but I am applying to it the logic which the gentleman from Wisconsin applies to very many of the items in this bill. What is "sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander." Wisconsin receives under this bill $278,300, as against $116,000 for the State of Virginia. The total commerce of Wisconsin in tonnage in 1913 was 18,031,869, a very considerable commerce, as against the commerce of Virginia of 36,558,608 tons, ranking fifth in the States of the American Union, New York, New Jersey, Michigan, and Ohio alone exceeding Virginia. The report of the engineers shows that Fox River for 1912–13 had a commerce of 145,890 tons; for the year 1913–14, 134,638 tons, of the value of $724,942. Congress has already expended upon that river nearly $4,000,000, with the result of a decreasing commerce. Now, this river is subject to the objections which the gentleman from Wisconsin has urged against other rivers, and yet he maintains the strictest silence when this and other items in his own State are considered.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, I will not testify; the House has witnessed Exhibit A itself. [Applause.] I do not wish, gentlemen, to take up your time. I wanted at some time to submit in a consecutive way some observations upon the subject of river improvements so far as respects my own State. I do not desire to detract from the industry and energy of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I rose a few minutes since to question the gentleman, and I did it with some diffidence because I did not wish to break the continuity of his self-laudation when he asseverated with what indefatigable energy and judicial fairness he had investigated all of these projects.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I would ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And yet when it comes to his own State he is as silent as the tomb. Now let me say to the residue of the delegation from Wisconsin that I do not question the merits of the projects in this bill affecting their State, but it is but candor for me to say that other projects of other States, which I believe to be meritorious, have met the objections of the gentleman from Wisconsin, while projects in his own State, standing upon identical grounds of those which he has criticized, receive no word of condemnation, but meet his warm approval. His palpable inconsistency I wish at this time to accentuate. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the pro forma amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Zippel Bay, Lake of the Woods, Minn.: For maintenance, $1,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 25, page 29, insert: "Improving Baudette Harbor and River, Minn., completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 109, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $2,750."

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, this is the same item which was included in the bill of last year, which was defeated in the Senate.

Mr. SPARKMAN. This is a new project.

Mr. STEENERSON. I believe this is a new project but a very meritorious one. This is a point on the Rainy River, and one of the most important points along the international boundary. During 1911, 4 steamers and 29 launches touched at Baudette on regular trips; 104 foreign vessels entered and cleared; and freight and passenger traffic amounted to 164,927 ton-miles and 788,300 passenger-miles, respectively; 71,188 tons miscellaneous freight and 94,710 passengers entering and leaving the port. The timber floated to and from Baudette and Spooner amounts to hundreds of millions of feet, board measure, annually. The Rainy River is navigable for 90 miles to International Falls and Fort Francis, Ontario, where the largest paper and lumber mills in the country are located. It is 10 miles from Lake of the Woods.

These are international waters, and the commerce is very large; and the main river, the Rainy River, at this point is about 1,500 feet wide and is a very deep river, but it is occupied very largely by timber and log booms. It is one of the biggest logging streams in the world. Hundreds of millions of feet are floated down to the Lake of the Woods, and the steamers have only a small space left them by these lumber industries. There are some of the largest sawmills in the world located at Baudette and Spooner, and this Baudette River comes in at this point and flows into the Rainy River. The banks along the Rainy River are very high and precipitous, so that it does not afford a suitable landing, and the place where it is proposed to construct this harbor is at the entrance of the junction of the Baudette River with the Rainy River, only half a mile or so from the main Rainy River. The villages of Baudette and Spooner, located on either side of the Baudette River just above the junction with the Rainy River, have already built wharves on either side, and it is really the only place for the steamers to turn. This small appropriation for a turning basin was recommended by the Board of Rivers and Harbors and by the Chief of Engineers at $2,750. The commerce, as I say, is very extensive and amounts into the hundreds of thousands of tons. It seems to me that, seeing how modest we are up there in Minnesota, and this being the only appropriation for northern Minnesota—it seems to me the fact that it is a new project ought not to condemn it. It seems to me from the arguments I have heard here to-day that there is not a strict adherence to the rule to the effect that only projects in the course of construction should be covered by this bill; and, therefore, I hope that the rule will not be so strictly applied. I appeal to the committee to relax that rule and allow this small $2,750 project at this place, that is so important for navigation, to be provided for, and not to wait another year. If there is anything else I could say, I would cite the fact that Baudette and Spooner, in this big forest region, were swept by the forest fire of 1910–11 and were wiped out, and yet they were rebuilt in a very short time; and they spent over $1,000 on these municipal wharves and have shown wonderful enterprise and public spirit. I hope that you will make an exception to the rule not to include new projects, and thereby include this one.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman demands a division. Those in favor of the amendment will rise and stand until they are counted.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the demand for a division.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to extend my remarks made awhile ago, by correcting an error which I made last Saturday in some remarks made then.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Harbor at Chicago, Ill.: Continuing improvement, by the construction of a breakwater to form an outer harbor, $374,000: Provided, That of the amount now on hand and available for rebuilding superstructure of existing breakwaters, $200,000, or so much thereof as may be deemed advisable, may, upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, be transferred by the Secretary of War and made available for extension of the outer breakwater.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, line 12, after the word "breakwater," insert the following: "And provided further, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary to construct the breakwater, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $1,490,300, inclusive of the amount herein appropriated and made available, and amounts heretofore appropriated."

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman how much time he wishes to consume on this amendment.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, I will state that I do not imagine there is going to be any serious objections to the amendment. [Laughter.] Of course, if there is objection, we will have to make some arrangement as to time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman there will be very serious objection to the amendment, and my purpose in rising was to see if we could agree on time. I understood that the gentleman probably wanted 15 or 20 minutes himself, or something like that.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I will state for the benefit of the House that if there is going to be any serious objection there may be some other members of the Illinois delegation who would like to be heard with reference to this matter, and I imagine that they will want a little time. I may want 15 or 20 minutes myself.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that there might be some objection to the paragraph as well as to the amendment.

Mr. GALLAGHER. We can include that in the time if there is any objection to the paragraph.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to suggest that I would like to get 20 minutes on this.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I would like about 15 minutes on this myself.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say that this is no laughing matter. I notice that the chairman of the committee is laughing.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman that I was smiling at something else.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Time has been granted indefinitely and without limit to everybody who has wanted to speak on questions that had no more significance than this all day. I consider this one of the most important items in the bill, not only to the city of Chicago but to the traffic of the Great Lakes, and I think it ought to be considered with seriousness and not made a joke.

We really consider this to be of great importance. We are serious about it, and we propose to discuss it with seriousness and to call the attention of the country to the importance of the question that is involved in it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Can we not fix some time? Will the gentleman from Illinois indicate?

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have 20 minutes myself. I am not speaking for anybody else.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have 15 minutes on this amendment.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is the gentleman for or against it?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I am in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that at this stage I shall object to any agreement. Let the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] proceed. He is a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] objects to any agreement.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, this amendment carries an appropriation of $1,500,000, lacking only about $10,000, and I consider it of some importance not only to the city of Chicago but also to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, that statement may mislead the House. It is not a fact. The gentleman is mistaken. That will come out in the argument. If that is what the gentleman from Arkansas wants his 15 minutes for, he will waste the time of the House.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I may find something else to say about it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's request be put.

Mr. GALLAGHER. The gentleman wanted time from the other side.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] have 10 minutes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I want 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Well, make it 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. GALLAGHER] may have 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. EDWARDS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto may end in 40 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, you can not do that. I want 20 minutes myself. I may get along with 15.

Mr. EDWARDS. Let us fix it at 45, then.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Oh, no. That will not do. Forty-five minutes are wanted on this side already, and there may be more time wanted.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I understand that 30 minutes will be taken up on that side.

Mr. GALLAGHER. No; 40 minutes. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON] wants some time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be unreasonable, but it does seem to me that in the present situation there ought not to be unlimited debate on a proposition of this character. It is something unusual, especially after we have been here for three or four days. An unlimited amount of debate on this question ought not to be asked for at this late hour.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I do not think those contentions ought to enter into it.

Mr. MADDEN. The lateness of the hour in the day takes nothing away from the importance of the question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I know; but you took some of the time away to-day.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not take any time away. I simply demanded that a quorum be present when there were only 25 Members here.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; you have done that twice.

Mr. MADDEN. And I will reserve the right to do it again if necessary. No such proposition has arisen with respect to any other proposition in this bill as now arises in regard to this. We are not unreasonable. We want to be heard. We think we have a provision here of great importance to the American people. We want to present our side of the case. We can not present it in 10 minutes. The gentleman from Washington speaks whenever he wants to. Nobody objects to him. I am not going to object when he wants to speak again. We are here asking for an opportunity to speak on behalf of the people of our State. We ought not to be cut off from the exercise of that right.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Chair put the request I made that my colleague [Mr. GALLAGHER] may have 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. GALLAGHER] may have 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. EDWARDS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I think we can get together on an agreement as to time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, I can not understand why there are several objections to our occupying a little time in the House to-night on the most important item in this bill.

Mr. EDWARDS. The objection does not seem to be as to occupying time. We are trying to arrange so that the gentleman can have the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]?

Mr. DONOVAN. What is the request?

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from Illinois is that his colleague be permitted to proceed for 15 minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Reserving the right to object, I want five minutes at some stage of these proceedings.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman will have any trouble in getting it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to be considered in this affair, and I must have five minutes at some stage of these proceedings. I do not often get it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. I must insist upon having five minutes here somewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for five minutes when the opportunity presents itself. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat surprised at the excitement that the introduction of this amendment has caused in this House. I am astonished at the statement of the chairman of the committee that there will be serious objection to it. I am also surprised at the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN] that he wants some time to oppose it. Now, what is the cause of this undue excitement? What is the reason for this serious objection?

The very first item in this bill, the appropriation for Portland, Me., was objected to on the ground that the city of Portland had no municipal harbor or docks. The city of Chicago is providing a municipal harbor and docks for the benefit of the city of Chicago and lake shipping of every character, paying for it out of moneys that have been raised by a city bond issue of $5,000,000, and is proceeding to build this harbor. The municipality has expended up to date in the neighborhood of $4,000,000 for the harbor that it is constructing on the lake just north of the entrance to the Chicago River. This amendment is introduced for the purpose of making the appropriation for the Chicago Harbor a continuing authorization. What are the facts? We have appropriated and authorized an expenditure of $1,250,000 for the breakwaters at Chicago Harbor. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of that money has already been made available for the work. This bill carries an appropriation for $574,000. We want you to adopt the amendment so that we can have a continuing authorization for the work. That is done at the request of the Army engineers and at the request of the local engineer. The reason they want the continuing appropriation is because they can save money to the United States Government by making it a continuing authorization. They are not saving any money to the city of Chicago. It is for the express purpose of saving the money to the people of the United States. For that reason we come here with the amendment at the request of the officials of the city of Chicago to ask you to insert it in this paragraph.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I do not care to be captious, but is it a fact that it is a condition precedent to the appropriation of the $1,250,000 or any other amount of money that the city of Chicago herself must build five piers for the purpose of creating a great harbor at that place?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Has that condition been complied with yet?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Has she built the five piers?

Mr. GALLAGHER. She has not built the five piers that we intend to build, but that is not the question. The question was that none of this money should be made available until the Secretary of War was satisfied that Chicago was going to proceed with the work.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. How many piers——

Mr. GALLAGHER. Hold on until I answer the question. The Secretary of War is satisfied with what the city is doing, and has released the money, and now we are proceeding to build the harbor.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. How many——

Mr. GALLAGHER. Now, let me say to you—because you are trying to create a wrong impression by the fact that you ask about the five piers——

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. No; I am not. I am merely seeking information.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Chicago does things in pretty good shape. Everybody will admit that. From a village on the prairie that men now living recollect we have built one of the greatest cities in the world, the second greatest city in the new world. [Applause.] We do business in Chicago, and we are doing business in this particular. Why, the city of Chicago has never come here before for any particular amount of money. You have given us only a little over $3,000,000—less than $3,500,000—in the whole history of the city; but the city of Chicago is now building a harbor that will cost $5,000,000 for preliminary work. There is no telling what it will spend before it is through.

They are spending $6,000,000 now to improve the Chicago River for harbor purposes by removing the center pier and constructing in place of the pier the new jackknife or bascule bridge in the interest of navigation. We are spending and have spent between $66,000,000 and $70,000,000 to build a ship canal, the connecting link in the proposed waterway that you intend to construct from the Lakes to the Gulf. That is money paid out by the city, and we now have the State bonded for $20,000,000 to prosecute that work. We do not come here begging anything. Chicago Harbor is one of the greatest harbors in this country, with a tremendous tonnage. You talk here about little creeks and streams that you want improved and waste the time of Congress discussing them when here is a great enterprise that ought to engage the earnest attention and serious consideration of every business man in this Hall. Every man who knows anything about the conditions of this immense harbor, one of the greatest harbors in the world, ought to be in favor of this amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the balance of my time for the express purpose of answering the various objections, with a view of convincing Members here that this is a meritorious amendment designed for the purpose of saving the money of the Government, and not for the city of Chicago.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I want to be enlightened about this, for I know little about it.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I thought the gentleman did not by the statement that he made that we had spent $1,400,000 on it. The whole improvement does not cost over $1,400,000.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The gentleman is mistaken; I made no such statement. I said that $1,250,000 was asked for. I hold in my hand a copy of the Chicago Tribune of the 13th instant, which gives the picture of a great convention hall when completed, and a picture of the harbor as it will appear when the convention hall shall have been completed, and it shows one pier. I do not put all the faith in that unless there is some better evidence of it. There are two columns of matter on the first page descriptive of the hall, as well as the whole output. I should like to know if that picture reflects the ultimate purpose of the backers of this movement?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman state to the House how his attention was drawn to that article?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I think the gentleman's colleague and mine, Mr. FOWLER, has a copy of that paper. I am acting in good faith. If this is a meritorious proposition, I want to be for it.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Of course, we do big things in Chicago. But that has nothing to do with this matter here at all. It is not connected up with it, and only shows what may possibly be done. That has nothing to do with the work of the city, and I do not know whether it is connected up with it. The amendment we are interested in refers solely to the building of the harbor.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I will ask if the railroad terminals, as well as the warehouses which were in contemplation, are to be abandoned?

Mr. GALLAGHER. No; it has not come to that stage yet.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Is it not a fact that a great park is about to take this space that otherwise might be kept for the purpose of utility?

Mr. GALLAGHER. There is nothing to that. If the gentleman has ever been in Chicago, he knows that we have the greatest system of parks in the world. We have miles of parks, parkways, and boulevards. The city of Chicago has expended $300,000 to get additional ground at this point for harbor purposes. But that has no relation to this proposition of building a harbor.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I was asking not only for my own information, but for the information of other Members who want it. All the queries I have propounded have been in good faith. I do not want to be captious, but I want enlightenment.

Mr. GALLAGHER. That has no connection with the proposition before the House. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the gentleman is entitled to reserve any time under the permission of the committee that he have 15 minutes. The Chair may recognize the gentleman again.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I do not care to take up any more time until I know what will be said against the proposition.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of my friend from Arkansas, I would like to answer some of the questions that he has asked the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER]. For five years before I came to this House I was a member of the city council of Chicago. During most of that time I was a member of the committee on harbors, wharves, and bridges, and it was during the time that I was a member of the city council that this arrangement affecting these piers was consummated and that the council took action on behalf of the city of Chicago with reference to them. As my colleague, Mr. GALLAGHER, has explained, the money that was appropriated some time ago by this body was to be released by the Secretary of War whenever he became satisfied that the city was going to carry out its agreement with reference to these piers. He has become so satisfied, and he has released the money. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN] asked whether these piers had been constructed. In the first place, he was in error in mentioning five piers, for there are three piers involved in the proposition, not five. One of these piers has been constructed. It is practically complete. It is all complete with the exception of some superstructure.

The concrete work for a full thousand feet out into the water is complete, and the reason why the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] is pressing this amendment is in order that we may be assured that shipping may use this pier that is finished. There must be some extension both to the northeast and the south of the breakwater that is there now and that has been there for some years. This pier juts out in an easterly direction, and boats must tie up either on the south or the north side of it. Both sides are without protection at this time except at the very outer end. There it comes out to a point where it is practically inside of this breakwater that runs in a northwesterly and southeasterly direction; but the two sides are without protection, and the very purpose of this amendment is to afford protection that will enable shipping to use the one pier that the city has already constructed and paid for. The other two piers are authorized, as I understand, and will be provided.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. When the other two shall have been constructed, will the appropriation as carried by this amendment, if passed, be enough to protect the three piers?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Yes. The three piers that are contemplated are within what we call Chicago Harbor district No. 1, and are all within the protection contemplated in this amendment and in this paragraph; and when these piers are constructed nothing beyond the work that is provided for in this paragraph, with the amendment that is proposed, will be needed to afford all three of the piers protection.

As to the convention hall that my friend inquired about, I assure him that is not connected with this project at all, as my colleague from Illinois stated. In connection with this construction of the harbor district No. 1 the city of Chicago acquired a right from the State of Illinois to create some made land by filling in a part of this area; and if this convention hall is erected, it is proposed by some citizens of Chicago that it be placed there. This is purely a tentative project at this time. Nothing definite has been done in respect to the matter. It does not enter into the question before us at all. As I understand, the Association of Commerce proposed that it would be well to put it up in that neighborhood, and if it should go there it would go upon made land; and if it should be placed where it is suggested now, it so happens that it will be in the vicinity of the shore end of this first pier that has been completed.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I gather from the location of the proposed convention hall, owing to its proximity and, I might say, juxtaposition to the pier already constructed, that the convention hall itself would usurp the ground and the space that should properly belong to the harbor.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I understand the gentleman's point. That is not correct, for this reason: In the first place, let me reiterate that this is merely a suggestion by some of the citizens of Chicago. It may never be placed there. The city may not consent to it; but the suggestion, if agreed to, would not interfere with the use of the pier, because it would be to the south of the pier. I understand from the Commissioner of Public Works of the city of Chicago, who has recently been in the city of Washington, that the work of constructing the tracks out onto this pier that has been completed, is now going on, so that the pier may be serviceable at the earliest possible moment for the conduct of traffic in the way of freight. This pier is a thousand feet long and, I think, 300 feet wide. It provides 7,000 feet of dockage, and is available for freight dockage. There is a plan in contemplation by the city to create a superstructure on certain parts of this pier, which will not interfere in any way with the use of the ground surface of the pier as it may be called, and this superstructure is to be used, to some extent, for passenger traffic; but that is all above the freight level of the pier, which is the street level.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I do not want any more time than is necessary to answer such questions as may be asked, and I will ask that I be given five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I had understood that as an aid to the harbor there, in the way of railroad terminals and facilities as well as the plat for warehouses, that this now, in a large measure, has been abandoned.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. What has been abandoned?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. That the railroad terminals and warehouse facilities had been abandoned and in their place a pleasure park, that is a very necessary thing sometimes in large cities, and a driveway had occupied some part of this ground which could be utilized for a number of business purposes. I just call attention to it——

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. The gentleman has not been correctly informed in that regard. That is not correct at all. Now, if I may have the attention of my friend from Arkansas, I would like to answer his question. There is contemplated in the city of Chicago what we call our boulevard link connecting the boulevard system on the north with the south side. That link might pass this point somewhere near the inner end of the pier or some distance inside of it. This plan, if finally carried out in that way, will not interfere with the use of this pier commercially because the level of the boulevard link will be carried either above or below the tracks, which will be at the pier level.

Mr. MANN. I think what the gentleman from Arkansas has reference to is the boulevard drive on the south side where there is no harbor at all and in another part of the city entirely away from this.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. It may be that that is what the gentleman had in mind, but that is miles away from this point.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I am not acquainted with the exact location of the proposed harbor or driveway. As my information has been gathered in a rather fragmentary way, I am only asking for enlightenment, and some other Members of the House are of the same opinion I am, and that is the reason I am asking these questions.

Mr. MANN. This harbor is on the north side of Chicago, north of the Chicago River, and the boulevard is way over on the south of the river, on the south side.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the plans of the city of Chicago for the improvement of its parks and driveways will not interfere in the slightest degree with the use of the pier which has been completed or with the two others in contemplation as freight terminals. As has been said by my colleague from Illinois, some objection was made, and I think the point was well taken to some of the items in this bill, due to the fact that large sums of money had been appropriated for the improvement of harbors in which there were no public terminal facilities, in which the terminal facilities already there were in the hands of private interests and where it was not possible to provide public terminal facilities. That objection can not be made in the case of this proposition affecting the harbor of Chicago. Chicago was asked in connection with previous appropriations to assure the Federal Government that the city would expend a large sum of money, running into the millions, to provide public piers, and we agreed we would do that; and, as I say, that proposition happened to be up in the city council when I was a member of that body on the committee on harbors, wharves, and bridges, and we agreed to provide three piers, each 1,000 feet long, in this harbor district No. 1, which is immediately north of the mouth of the Chicago River. We assured and convinced the Secretary of War that we were going ahead with our plans, and he released such money as had been appropriated in the past, and we have gone ahead and completed the first pier, 1,000 feet long and 200 or 300 feet wide.

Mr. COX. At what cost?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. At a cost of about $4,000,000. I believe that is the amount that has been expended on that improvement. Now, the point is just this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. May I have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. The point is just this: If this pier, in building which the city of Chicago has spent millions, and the other two piers, in the construction of which the city of Chicago is going to spend other millions, are to be used by shipping, and are to be put to the use to which they were intended by the city of Chicago and by the Government, the Government must provide the protection facilities that it was understood it was going to provide when this proposition was originally brought up, and it must provide the protection facilities which are contemplated in this paragraph that is now before the House and in the amendment which has been offered by my colleague [Mr. GALLAGHER].

These three piers run out in an easterly direction in the lake. Some distance beyond the end of those piers—the one that is there, and the other two that will be put there—is a breakwater that runs in a northwesterly and southeasterly direction, but it does not come to the shore within half a mile at the north end. Those piers will be exposed to northeasterly storms and southeasterly storms, and the result will be that the shipping can not tie up to those piers upon which we have expended millions unless the Government provides the protection that we were given to understand would be provided at the time this proposition was entered into and the agreement made between the Government and the city; and all that we are asking in the amendment of my colleague [Mr. GALLAGHER] is that the Government shall carry out its part of the program. We have carried out our part.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. KENT. I would like to ask the gentleman as to the relative importance of this particular project in terms of tonnage. We have been discussing all sorts of small problems, but this one seems to me to be of immense importance in the matter of tonnage.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. In answer to my friend from California I will say that the water freight traffic at Chicago runs into millions of tons in quantity and hundreds of millions of dollars in value annually.

It is of vast importance. We have, during the summer months there, tremendous traffic from the east shore of the lake in perishable fruits, and we want to use these piers to tie up these fruit boats and get that perishable fruit from the boats to this pier, so that it can go from the boats directly into the cars and be carried to its destination with the least possible delay. These tracks are now being laid down on the pier which has been completed. This pier would be available for use this summer if that protection were there. It is not there now, and I presume, therefore, that except in weather that is very favorable and at times when it looks as though it were going to continue so for a matter of 12 hours at least—except at such times, that pier will not be available for use by shipping unless this protection is provided.

This [indicating] is the breakwater, as shown on the map here. This is the breakwater I have tried to describe. The kind of breakwaters we must have are these two pieces here [indicating]. If these extensions are not made these piers will be exposed to storms from two directions. We want the Government to put this protection [indicating] in so that the shipping on the lake will have the benefit of the public pier that we have put up there and the ones which we are going to put up there.

The important element of the pending amendment is that it authorizes the letting of a continuing contract. It does not increase the appropriation made in this paragraph, but it makes certain the continuance of the Government's part in the construction of this harbor—namely, the protecting breakwaters to their completion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, is anybody going to speak on the other side of this question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; I propose to close.

Mr. MADDEN. Is anybody else going to speak?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] wanted to speak.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition. I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to speak for 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent to speak for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I have thought this matter of sufficient importance to reduce what I have to say to writing in order that I might be able to state the case fully to the committee, but it is unfortunate that this item in the bill comes up at an hour when everybody seems to be hungry, and there is nobody in the House but the enemies of the item. It is hardly fair to be called upon to present to the benches a case as important as this, and it seems to me if this matter is to be considered upon its merits we ought to have a quorum of the committee here.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. RUBEY. I suggest to the gentleman that I, for one, have been here all day.

Mr. MADDEN. And so have I.

Mr. RUBEY. And a great many Members are here that have been here most of the day. If the gentleman desires at this time to make a point of no quorum, I shall object to extending remarks in the future during the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to insist upon it, but I think it is unfair to a great project such as the one we have to present to be called upon to present the case when there is nobody in the House. I have been here all the time, not only all day to-day but every day.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DONOVAN. Why does not the gentleman move to rise and consider it on another day?

Mr. MADDEN. I have not the power to get the committee to rise, but my time is going on, and therefore I shall ask to go on.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further consideration of this paragraph be passed over for one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that further consideration of this paragraph be passed over for one hour. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. And I hope that I may have my time then.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Calumet River, Ill. and Ind.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $30,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, to come in after the last paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, after line 16, insert the following:

"That the portion of the old channel of the Calumet River in the north quarter of fractional section 7, township 37 north, range 15 east, of the third principal meridian, south of the Indian boundary line, in Cook County, Ill., which lies outside of the new channel lines as established by the United States and shown on 'Map of the Calumet River, Ill., from Lake Michigan to Calumet Lake, to accompany report of W. G. Ewing, United States attorney, to the Attorney General, respecting cession of right of way for improvement of said river, under act of Congress approved July 5, 1884,' is hereby abandoned as navigable water."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We have no objection to that amendment. I was going to offer the same amendment myself as a committee amendment, but was temporarily out when the paragraph was read. But I have no objection to it. So far as the committee is concerned, we will accept it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope no objection will be made to it. The provision was brought before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and reported favorably by them, but there was no hope of recognition to pass it. It is meritorious and it ought to go in, and therefore I hope no point will be made against it.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is a meritorious amendment, and ought to be adopted.

Mr. MANN. It is subject to a point of order. If my colleague will reserve a point of order on it, I will make a very brief statement. I do not desire to detain the committee long. Twice before a similar provision has been passed as to other parts of the Calumet Channel. Calumet River used to be a very winding stream, and in 1884 Congress provided that if the owners of the property should donate the property necessary to make the channel 200 feet in width and make it straight that that project should be adopted. That was done. The new channel has been constructed. In the deeds which were made to the Government and which the Government accepted it was provided—

That the shore or dock lines of said river as were established and shown on said plat shall hereafter for all purposes be taken as the true meander lines of said stream.

The new channel is there, but the owners of the property on both sides of the old channel can not make any use of the new channel because there is not space without crossing the old narrow channel of the river, and there has been no definite statement by the Government that the old channel is abandoned as navigable water. We have not been willing in the past to abandon all the old channel as navigable water, because portions of the old channel were desired for turning basins. Portions of the old channel have been used, and have been reserved for turning basins. But whenever the property owners have asked that a particular piece of the old channel be abandoned as navigable water—and it has not been needed for turning basins or for any other purpose in connection with the new channel—we have twice passed similar provisions, and this is one which is recommended by the Army engineers. It is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. ADAMSON. Nobody made any point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FOWLER. I did.

Mr. ADAMSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not hear him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] made the point of order.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not think myself that it is subject to the point of order, but the Chair has ruled.

Mr. MANN. I think it is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mississippi River from Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, including salaries, clerical, office, traveling, and miscellaneous expenses of the Mississippi River Commission: Continuing improvement with a view to securing a permanent channel depth of 9 feet, $5,000,000, which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission, as approved by the Chief of Engineers, for the general improvement of the river, for the building of levees, and which may be done, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, by hired labor or otherwise, between Head of Passes and Cape Girardeau, Mo., and for surveys, including the survey from Head of Passes to the headwaters of the river, in such manner as in their opinion shall best improve navigation and promote the interests of commerce at all stages of the river: Provided, That of the money hereby appropriated so much as may be necessary shall be expended in the construction of suitable and necessary dredge boats and other devices and appliances and in the maintenance and operation of the same: Provided further, That the watercourses connected with said river and the harbors upon it, now under the control of the Mississippi River Commission and under improvement, together with the harbor at Vicksburg, Miss., which is hereby transferred to and placed under the control and jurisdiction of such commission, may, in the discretion of said commission, upon approval by the Chief of Engineers, receive allotments for improvements now under way or hereafter to be undertaken, to be paid for from the amount herein appropriated.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I assume that it is proper to submit amendments to this paragraph, although the next paragraph has relation to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. I move to strike out the figures "$5,000,000," in line 23, page 30, and to substitute "$1,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, line 23, strike out the figures "$5,000,000" and substitute therefor "$1,000,000."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I do not assume to be a better judge than the engineers of the necessities of the lower Mississippi River. In view, however, of the fact that we are spending large sums of money at this time, I do believe it is well for us to economize, if possible, in some of these large appropriations. It appears from the engineers' report that in October last $4,556,387 was on hand for further use on this project. If any portion of that money is to be used at this time, it appears it might relieve the situation which confronts us at the United States Treasury.

On several occasions I have spoken on the subject of the Mississippi River, and have given the opinions of critics, of engineers, of people who live on the river, and of newspapers from New Orleans and at Vicksburg and at Memphis criticizing the character of the appropriations on the Mississippi River and the improvements now being made. There is a well-grounded opposition, apparently, in the minds of many reputable people against the large appropriations that are being made at the present time for the Mississippi River. The complaint, largely, is lodged against the system of improvements. For that reason some time ago I introduced a resolution asking that a complete investigation of the present system be had and that the President appoint a high-class board, if necessary, for the purpose of making the investigation. In response to that I received many letters from engineers and others throughout the country urging that my proposal was good, in view of the many criticisms which have been lodged against the work now being conducted by the Mississippi River Commission.

The present system is declared by experts and by people living along the river to be a patchwork system of levees here and there. It is also charged, and charged very forcibly, that the Mississippi River levee proposition is largely one for the reclamation of lands, as was stated on the floor a day or two ago, and that a great many acres of land are to be reclaimed by this system of levee construction. If so, it is not primarily for the purpose of navigation. I believe it is improper to pay Government funds for such purposes, or at least there ought to be a liberal contribution, and it ought to be published, so that the people of this country whose money we are paying out on the Mississippi will know what is being paid by local communities toward the reclamation of lands.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Can the gentleman tell how much money is on hand as of date January 1 and available for this improvement?

Mr. FREAR. I stated that over $4,000,000 was available in October last. That was after the allotment was had.

Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss this to any extent, because I realize that I have taken the time of the committee and of the House on this Mississippi River item heretofore, but I do wish to say this: We all know that the traffic on the Mississippi River has rapidly decreased—I think something like 80 per cent—within the last 15 years or thereabouts, and that this appropriation is primarily for the building of levees.

We are placing in the hands of this commission a great deal of money, $77,000,000 or $80,000,000, as nearly as I can ascertain from the engineers' report on the lower branch of the Mississippi River. No one knows what this great scheme will cost. It is for us to handle the matter intelligently, knowing that we will have to face the results and be responsible. We can go along in this reckless way under pressure that comes from one part of the country or the other, but eventually you have got to meet it. There are people in that district who claim that the money is being thrown away in this matter of patchwork construction.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the $4,000,000 on hand has been contracted for and is on hand no longer. There is none on hand now. There was $3,750,000 allotted out of the $20,000,000 bill passed last year. Complaint has been made by citizens in the Mississippi Valley ever since the beginning of the Government against whatever system was in vogue. There are those there now who are bitterly opposed to levees, as the gentleman from Wisconsin has stated. Of course, there are very few of them. The Government in 1822 appointed a Board of Engineers to investigate the question, and that board declared that the only way to control the floods, and that is what this money is largely used for—was to build levees. In 1850 another commission was appointed, and they reported the same way.

In 1851 another commission examined it for 10 years and made the most extensive examination ever made of any river on the face of the earth, and their report, the report of Humphreys and Abbott, two of the most distinguished engineers that we ever had, was the same way. Gen. Humphreys was a very distinguished general in the Union Army, and after that Chief of Engineers. Gen. Abbott was one of the greatest engineers we ever had, and by the way, I am happy to say, is still living, nearly 100 years old. That commission reported that the only way to protect the deltas from flood was by levees. Congress has appointed numerous commissions itself to make investigations, and every commission that ever investigated it has, after investigation, reported that the only way to control the floods was by levees.

It 1879 we created the Mississippi River Commission. It was composed of officers from the Army, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and from civil life. The personnel, of course, is changed every few years. Gen. Benjamin Harrison, afterwards President of the United States, was at one time a member of that commission. Capt. James B. Eads, one of the most famous of all the civil engineers the country has produced, was at one time a member of it. That commission has been at work ever since 1879 and has been studying the question all the while, and after the most exhaustive examination has reported that the only way to control the floods is by levees. Always there have been some men who have said that that was not the right way, but there has never been a time since the creation of the Mississippi River Commission in all the volumes of their reports and after innumerable investigations when the commission was not of the opinion that the only way to control the floods was by the construction of levees. Others have taken the opposite view, but of course they are very few and far between.

The people along the lower Mississippi in various levee districts have contributed since the Civil War, including what has been put in this year, about $75,000,000 for the construction of levees.

The congressional district that I have represented since 1884—the total assessed value of all taxable property was then $29,000,000—has contributed $25,000,000 to build these levees. It would be charging these people with lunacy to presume that after all these years of experience they would still continue to subject themselves voluntarily to the tremendous tax which they have to pay in order to build levees if they did not know that that was their salvation.

All political parties and nearly all the prominent men in all political parties have insisted that the Federal Government ought at least to contribute. The Federal Government has since 1879 contributed $33,000,000, while we have put up $75,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cox). The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Go on; go on!

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, this is a subject that I must cease talking about, because I have discussed it for so many years——

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, as I was about to say, as the membership of the House knows, I have devoted 12 years to the study of this subject, to the exclusion practically of all other subjects, and I have become somewhat enamored of the sound of my own voice whenever I take up the subject, and am therefore apt to abuse the privilege of the House by talking about it too much. The Members will note that at the bottom of the map that is before them the expression "the process by which the country above is relieved is the process by which the country below is ruined." That is an expression of Lieut. Elliot in his report in 1850 on the improvement of the territory north of this great delta. When these great States in here [indicating] to the north were being improved, were being cleared, when the farms were being drained, and the ditches were being dug, and the creeks straightened, and eventually the farms undertiled, the water was rushed into these tributaries so precipitately that it was utterly impossible for the people in the lower valley to raise their levees as fast as the increase in the volume of water pouring upon them required they should be raised. Congress, therefore, realizing that it was a duty that the Federal Government owed, has contributed liberally heretofore.

To show the thoroughness of the investigation, let me say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] that along my district for a stretch of 200 miles, in order to refute the very popular fallacy that the building of levees causes the river to fill up, extensive experiments and investigations were made. That is a very popular and an almost universal belief. It is one of the remarkable things how so many people have heard it and how all believe it. In order to demonstrate that it is not true, in one reach of that river extending for 200 miles along the front of my district the Mississippi River Commission has taken 41,000 soundings. In 1881 they established bench marks, to which all levels could be referred, and they have made these 41,000 soundings, and have also subjected the whole river to the same test, and they report that there is no truth in the theory at all. They agree that there is but one thing to do, and that is to build levees. Otherwise we would not tax ourselves for levees. We tax all of our property. We put a tax on everything that is produced—on a bale of cotton, on a bag of rice, on a ton of hay, on a gallon of molasses. We tax the oysters that are taken out of the ocean. We put a levee tax on every man who does any sort of business for profit, for the privilege of doing it, be he merchant or the man who drives a dray, and then we levy an ad valorem tax. My taxes on my property where I live are 4 per cent. We have done that to raise money, and we have raised money enough, according to the statement of our engineers, more than enough to build the levees there high enough to keep off the floods but for the increased volume that comes on us, due to the improvement of the States to the north of us. To illustrate: In 1858 the record flood volume was 1,475,000 cubic feet a second. The value of farm property then in here [indicating] between the Missouri and the Ohio River was $800,000,000. In 1880 this property was assessed at $5,000,000,000. In 1882, the flood volume had increased to 1,800,000 cubic feet, and in 1910 these farm values—and I am speaking only of farm values—had increased to the inconceivable sum of $20,000,000,000, and—mark the truth of this prophecy here, that "the process by which the country above is relieved is the process by which the country below is ruined"—the flood volume of 1912 was 2,300,000 cubic feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I shall not address the House longer. I am very much obliged.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COX). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out from the same paragraph the provision beginning with line 10 and ending with the word "same" on line 14.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 10, strike out the following:
"Provided, That of the money hereby appropriated so much as may be necessary shall be expended in the construction of suitable and necessary dredge boats and other devices and appliances and in the maintenance and operation of the same."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, ordinarily I realize that there must be a certain power vested in the commission or in any board that is required to perform a certain act.

But where we are placing so many millions in the hands of these men as we are now doing I am not prepared to believe that we ought to leave in their hands the entire power of determination as to how that money shall be used. They can build a fleet of 100 vessels if they choose, send them anywhere along this river or wherever they have jurisdiction, and the money is being continually added to the fund under their control by the Government, growing constantly. I have heard a great many criticisms as to the methods pursued by the commission. I believe that the more we yield to any board or any commission the power to handle money in this manner the more we are liable to have profligate waste in public affairs. This is a tremendous large sum of money and these men are very eager to get it. Their report last year demanded $14,000,000 for the Mississippi River, but the committee cut it down. They are anxious to get money, and they wish to use it for all specified and unspecified purposes, much like the engineers pursue in the improvement of the Mississippi River. I concede the gentleman from Mississippi is very well informed and I have the very highest appreciation of his knowledge on this subject.

The gentleman stated that in Northern States, where this drainage area exists, the lands have improved, whereas lands along the river have suffered. The north lands have improved, but not because of any drainage system that has been evolved by the Government, but because the country has become settled, northern lands have been improved and increased in value; but there seems to be no relation between that increase and this delta system as far as I can gather, but the money which the gentleman says is taxed on his people is to be returned a great many fold, as I understand it, when the levee system is perfected. It will amount to billions of dollars when all these millions of acres of land are reclaimed. This, of course, will return through any tax investment if the projects are intelligently handled; but there is nothing in the record, so far as I have been able to find in the engineer's report, to show what contributions are made in those localities. What we get in the report is what the Government is expending, that is all. I have read with a great deal of interest the work of the gentleman from Mississippi on this subject, but what has been privately contributed does not appear in the engineer's report—at least I have not run across it in the investigations I have made. It is generally conceded on the flood question that there ought to be something done. I believe everybody concedes that; but when it comes to the question of land reclamation, which seems to be a large element entering into this appropriation every year, I can not believe it is right for the Government to contribute. We have the Feather River proposition; we have other river propositions where floods occur, and we will, of course, have to determine what contribution shall be made on this and every other river for land reclamation if we begin this policy. I understand there is no system of required contributions, but it just depends upon how much will be given by the localities. If the gentleman can give me any information on the point as to these contributions, I will be obliged to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word—or, rather, I will rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. The contributions now, including the amount raised to be expended during the coming season by the various levee districts, since the Civil War have been $75,000,000. There are numerous documents, I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. FREAR. Government works?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. On this question; and if the gentleman will read the report I made on the bill last year he will find it fully set forth in detail. Now, the gentleman understands that all political parties have declared in their platforms that they favor this appropriation for the purpose of controlling the floods.

Mr. FREAR. Well, I have said to the gentleman, they have not declared for any particular amount or for any particular system.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. But they are in favor of it——

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In just a moment I will yield to the gentleman—and the engineers have estimated, after the most careful examination, after the last big flood, when they felt they did have data upon which they could base an estimate, that $60,000,000 would complete the system. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said that all political parties had declared in favor of this proposition.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Had done that; yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that the Democrats feel bound by anything in the last Democratic platform?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I will let the gentleman make answer to his own facetious inquiry. But this is not of recent date—this conviction. Mr. Garfield said:

The wisdom of Congress should devise some plan by which that river should cease to be a terror to those who lived upon its banks.

This has been conceded by all the Presidents who have succeeded him, particularly by Republican Presidents—to their great credit, in my opinion. Mr. Roosevelt said that—

The Nation must build the levees and build them better and more scientifically than ever before.

Mr. Taft said—and I am sorry the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] in the remarks he printed in the RECORD criticizing this expenditure did not quote this part of Mr. Taft's speech, because one judges from reading the gentleman's printed speech that Mr. Taft was opposed to it. Mr. Taft said:

I am strongly in favor of expending the whole $50,000,000 to save that part of the country from floods, in a reasonable time, and to provide a proper levee system.

The Democratic platform declared for it, and the Republican platform declared for it, and the Progressive Party's platform declared for it, and so far as we can be bound by platform declarations—and each man must decide that for himself—our parties have committed us to it. Now, I wrote this book before there was any serious controversy in this country as to the binding force of party platform declaration, and, fortunately for me, I stated in this book that I believed that while these declarations were persuasive, that gentlemen who propose legislation and who attempt to commit the Government to large expenditures should go further than simply to quote platform pledges and give good reasons upon which the Congress could base its action; that while the platform declaration might persuade the will, it was the duty of the proponents of legislation to go further and convince the judgment. I attempted to do that in my book, and I hope I have succeeded.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not want to consume more than a minute or two of the time, but upon the suggestion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] I want to say that the district which I represent has five counties bordering upon the Mississippi River, the first, at Cape Girardeau, being the head of the levee system provided for under this bill, and those five counties have provided by local taxation and paid, so the levee boards inform me, $6 for every dollar the Government has expended in the construction of levees. I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to say that he desired to have some information upon that point.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. FREAR. I say that I find no record anywhere that is an official record of those contributions. At least, there is nothing that appears in the engineers' report, and nothing unless it may appear in a publication like that of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS's]. That is the reason I think it ought to be given, so that we may know what contributions have been made.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Government engineers, I suppose, make no report upon this. However, I believe, if I am not mistaken, that there were full detailed statements made by the different speakers at the levee hearings before the River and Harbor Committee about a year ago. I think several of the parties at that time, representing levee boards in Missouri and other States, made statements of the amount of money that had been expended by levee districts in the several States. The exact amount I am not now able to give, because I have not given special attention to it for the purpose of giving information at this time, but I do recall that the different levee boards have stated that from local taxation they have collected and expended $6 for every dollar that the Government has expended in the construction of levees.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will yield.

Mr. FREAR. That would amount to something like $200,000,000?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am speaking of five Missouri counties that are in my district.

Mr. FREAR. The Government has spent, as I understand, over $80,000,000 on the Mississippi River, but only a portion for the levees.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COX). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio River to and including the mouth of the Missouri River: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $500,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, on this part of the river—this 200-mile stretch of the river—I understand from the engineer's report that $17,223,000 has already been expended. That is according to the last report. I do not find the amount that was available.

Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph, if I have not already moved that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. FREAR. I do not find the amount that was available for use, although $250,000 was allotted after the last appropriation.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the amount on hand on November 1 was $376,000, in round numbers.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; $376,000. It would appear to me, then, that there is a large balance available, unless that has already been distributed.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have not the figures myself, but I have no doubt that a great deal of that sum has been expended since November 1.

Mr. FREAR. I wish to state this in regard to this 200-mile project, that it is probably the most expensive project that we have in the country to-day, according to reports. We have lost 30 per cent of the traffic on the Mississippi River in the last two years, according to the statement that has been furnished by the engineer's report.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. You say there has been a loss of 30 per cent in the traffic within the last two years?

Mr. FREAR. I understand so; a loss from 435,040 tons to 304,538 tons, as shown by the St. Louis receipts and shipments.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And we had lost about 97 per cent prior to that?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; about 80 per cent.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And we have lost 30 per cent of that 3 per cent that we had left? [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. Now I wish to quote from a gentleman who stands high in this Government, namely, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], given to the press some months ago.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Have you any figures on how much freight was carried on this river?

Mr. FREAR. I have it as 258,209 tons in 1914.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is there any through traffic on the river at all between St. Louis and New Orleans?

Mr. FREAR. There is very little information that comes from the report.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, to read briefly from a gentleman who knows a great deal about the waterways of this country, and whose judgment we may accept. He says the following in regard to this particular project. I quote from Senator BURTON of Ohio:

We have expended more money on this stretch of the Mississippi that the Prussian Government has spent on the whole Rhine. While they carry an average of 45,000,000 tons a year, nearly 200 times the traffic on the Mississippi River on this 200-mile project, the fact is that the Mississippi has to-day a sufficient channel to handle the traffic of the Rhine, 200 times the present amount, and despite that fact, waterway commerce on that historic river falls each year to a lower level.

Mr. Chairman, in view of that statement that we have spent more on that 200-mile stretch than has been expended on the whole river Rhine and have less than 1 ton conveyed on that stretch as compared with 200 tons on the river Rhine, I say, Is it not time for us to inquire what we are doing, and how fast we are appropriating money? We have have appropriated over $17,000,000 on that 200-mile project.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Do you reckon the committee intends to bring back the traffic to the river?

Mr. FREAR. I would not attempt to assert or predict as to that.

Mr. CALLAWAY. You say the traffic in the last two years has fallent off, and they have expended enormous sums on it in the last two years in dredging and all kinds of work, and instead of the traffic coming up it is going back all the time. Does not that prove that the river transportation in this country is playing out?

Mr. FREAR. It would seem so. That is my judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mississippi River from the mouth of the Missouri River to Minneapolis, Minn.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $1,200,000.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ESCH: After the figures "$1,200,000." on page 32, line 15, strike out the period and insert a colon, and add: "Provided, That the Chief of Engineers may use such amount of said sum, not to exceed $50,000, as in his judgment may be necessary, to make such experiments in the transportation of heavy freights on said Mississippi River between the mouth of the Ohio River and St. Louis and between Dubuque, Iowa, and St. Paul, Minn., at all stages of water in said river, with the experimental floats described in House document No. 857, Sixty-third Congress, second session, as will fully demonstrate the economy or lack of economy in the transportation of such heavy freights, and particularly upstream in parts of said river in which said improvement has been completed or practically completed."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, in the river and harbor appropriation act of June 25, 1910, there was inserted this provision:

The Chief of Engineers, under the direction of the Secretary of War, is hereby authorized to design and construct two experimental towboats of modern but different types, with a complement of suitable barges and necessary loading and unloading facilities for towing and delivering supplies along the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and in making designs for such boats the said Chief of Engineers shall investigate and consider types of boats in use for similar purposes on nontidal rivers in this and other countries, and for the purposes of such investigation, designs, and construction there is hereby appropriated the sum of $500,000.

The language of that proviso would not permit the Chief of Engineers to use any money in demonstrating the utility or inutility of the models of towboats and barges recommended by the commission appointed under this provision. The language does not authorize the use of any part of the $500,000 to demonstrate the value of these types recommended. Moreover, even if the language did so allow, there will not, in my opinion, be anything left of the $500,000 with which to make the demonstration; for under this report, a copy of which I have in my hand and which is referred to in the amendment, the cost of the 2 towboats, the 12 barges, and the 2 barges for the unloading and loading devices, together with the expenses of the commission up to date, will practically exhaust the $500,000. Therefore my amendment has for its purpose the diverting of a sum not exceeding $50,000 of the $1,200,000 for the improvement of the upper Mississippi, to make a complete and thorough demonstration of the two types of towboats and of the 12 barges, and of the 2 unloading devices recommended by the Army engineers.

It is not necessary to secure data with reference to the utility of barges and towboats for downstream traffic. We have data enough for that already. The Ohio furnishes us the data for that. What we want to demonstrate is the availability of these two towboats, the one of the double-tunnel type and the other of the stern-wheel type, for upstream navigation with a heavy load. We want to know whether these two types of towboats will do the work expected. If they do not, then the question may come to us as to the wisdom of increasing appropriations for the upper river or any of its tributaries. I wish to have this demonstration made in those sections of the river where we have already attained the appropriate depth, the stretch from the mouth of the Ohio up to St. Louis, a very difficult stretch of the Mississippi, because of the rapidity of the current.

I wish also to have the demonstration made in the section of the river between Dubuque and St. Paul, much of which has already been completed to the 6-foot-channel standard. I wish to have these towboats determine whether or not they can take up six barges loaded at a maximum of 880 tons or whether they will have to reduce the number to five barges, or four barges, three barges, two barges, or one. This demonstration can not be made unless we make the funds available for that purpose. From reading this report I assume that the Government engineers wish to make the demonstration in the course of construction work or improvement work on the river, in the haulage of brush and of rock.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ESCH. The use of these towboats and barges in the improvement work on the river, in hauling brush and rock, would not be a complete demonstration for commercial purposes, because the brush and rock would be hauled only in the uncompleted sections of the river. I wish the demonstration made where the river is already completed to the required depth. I wish to have it tested in order to determine whether these new towboats, the tunnel type and the stern-wheel type, can make schedule time or not; whether they can meet the cross currents that occur in our upper river because of the construction of our wing dams. Why not have a complete and thorough demonstration made, so that the results may be published to the world and private business can judge whether or not to invest its capital?

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know whether the gentleman is aware of the fact, but there are two of these tunnel-type, twin-screw towboats in use on the Missouri between St. Louis and Kansas City. They have been in use for three seasons and are used very successfully, and they take two steel barges and a lighter with them. There is also one stern-wheel boat in use. There are three towboats in use now during the present season.

Mr. ESCH. That may meet the conditions on the Missouri, but the conditions are vastly different from what they are in the upper sections of the Mississippi.

Mr. BORLAND. If they can meet the conditions on upstream work in the Missouri, they can do it on the upper part of the Mississippi.

Mr. ESCH. What objection can there be to making the most complete test of these boats and barges which the engineers have recommended?

Mr. BORLAND. It seems hardly worth while, when they are on a commercial basis now in the country.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I only rise for the purpose of saying that we have already a provision of law in force to make the very experiments the gentleman from Wisconsin is seeking to make by his amendment. It covers the entire river. I want to say that in 1910, after most thorough consideration of that question, it was determined to try such an experiment, and the large sum of $500,000 was appropriated for the purpose. The provision is as follows:

The Chief of Engineers, under the direction of the Secretary of War, is hereby authorized to design and construct two experimental towboats of modern but different types, with a complement of suitable barges and necessary loading and unloading facilities for towing and delivering supplies along the Mississippi River and its tributaries; and in making designs for such boats the said Chief of Engineers shall investigate and consider types of boats in use for similar purposes on nontidal rivers in this and other countries, and for the purposes of such investigation, designs, and construction there is hereby appropriated the sum of $500,000.

After that became a law the Chief of Engineers proceeded to carry out the provision, and to that end formed a commission to investigate and pass upon the subject. That commission either made or is about to make a final report on the subject.

Mr. ESCH. The report is already made. I read from the report of the engineers that were sent abroad.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I made inquiry several days ago—within the last 10 days—about the progress they were making, and was led to believe they had not yet finally determined just what sort of boats to recommend or construct.

Mr. ESCH. Their report was made on the 20th of February, 1914, and it has been indorsed by the Secretary of War. They have had a year in which to make their plans and determination.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I understood that they had not as yet finally determined the matter; but the point I make is that there is a provision of law equally as comprehensive as that contained in this amendment.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. The language which the gentleman read in that provision of the act of 1910 does not authorize the board to expend any money in demonstration work. That is the point I am making.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, I think it does; I differ with the gentleman about that.

Mr. ESCH. It is for designs.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I understand there is money appropriated for this purpose already.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; $500,000, and it has not all been expended.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to one or two facts.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. FREAR. I desire to offer an amendment and I want five minutes. This is the only project that touches my district.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and all the gentlemen from Wisconsin, to the fact that there is now, and has been for the last three years, in successful operation in Kansas City a navigation company with the stock owned by the merchants and jobbers of that city. This corporation has in cash capital a million and a quarter dollars. Of that they have used approximately four hundred to five hundred thousand dollars, and have about $800,000 still on hand. When this company began the navigation of the Missouri River between Kansas City and St. Louis they knew that if they spent their entire capital in Texas deck boats they might wreck the whole proposition, because we had reached that stage where those boats would not do the work. So they began this experimental work on their own behalf to provide the most practical type of boats. They sent abroad, and they sent to all of the rivers in this country to study the best types of boats. The result is they have put in commission three boats, two of them of the tunnel type, twin-screw steamers, and the other is a stern-wheeler. One of the two twin-screw steamers is a packet boat; that is, it carries passengers as well as freight. The other two are towboats. They tow covered steel barges, one usually in front and one usually behind. In the low stages of water, the improvements not having been finished through to St. Louis, the boats must carry a lighter, to which to transfer a part of their freight in order to lighter when they get to a place where there is a low stage of water. I will put into the record a statement of the eight barges that they own, runing from fourteen hundred tons down to 200 tons. It is very difficult to make headway upstream up the Missouri River, for it has as powerful a current as any river in the world, and yet these tunnel-type boats have made headway, and they make schedule time. They run on schedule. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will come there at any time, I shall be very glad to show him the fleet of boats in operation. They have been in successful operation now for three years.

Mr. ESCH. What is the horsepower of the tunnel-type boat?

Mr. BORLAND. The Advance is 600 horsepower; the A. M. Scott, twin screw, tunnel type, is 600; and the Chester, twin-screw packet, is 700 horsepower.

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman will probably remember that the types recommended by the Army board were double that in power.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I know that the type is larger than that, but we have found this type successful. It may be that they do not feel quite safe in investing their money in larger boats, but inasmuch as these men are risking a million and a quarter dollars of their own money in this kind of navigation they are doing it in a businesslike way. They are making this experiment, and they are making it successfully, and if they lose every dollar of the $350,000 they would still have left $800,000 with which to make further experiments. It is their purpose to make a success of navigation on the inland waterways of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire just one minute for the purpose of offering an amendment to the amendment. I move to strike out the words "St. Paul" and insert the word "Minneapolis." I do that for the reason that in the stretch of river from St. Paul to Minneapolis we have a condition peculiar to that particular portion of the river.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH]: Strike out the words "St. Paul" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Minneapolis."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to substitute the figures "$600,000" in place of the figures "$1,200,000," appearing in line 15, page 32.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 15, strike out "$1,200,000" and insert "$600,000."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this is the only project in which I may fairly be charged to be concerned. I have made a motion to divide the amount appropriated, because I believe in these times we ought to economize, and the amendment is offered to that end unless we have greater need for this appropriation on the project than has been shown. This river flows 100 miles along my district, and its tributaries flow farther than that. There is not a single boat line so far as I know, with the exception of two or three months in the year, that goes through from St. Paul to St. Louis. There is very little traffic upon this river. Taking the engineers' estimate of the distance, where they have made the completed improvement, instead of a 6-foot channel, as they propose, it would be impossible to get more than 2 feet of water, because the water is not there and in all probability never will be except for short periods.

It is reported in the engineers' report as 2,145,315 tons, and I wish to give the character of that commerce. The brush used in the construction work, 82,450 tons; gravel, 398,178 tons; rocks, 708,000 tons; sand, 562,000 tons, aggregating 1,750,000 tons. In addition to that they have logs, 98,268 tons; lumber, 30,408 tons; wood, 34,000 tons, aggregating 1,912,000 tons. All of this, understand, is not carried by raft. It does not require a 6-foot channel for that character of traffic, and it leaves a balance of a little over 200,000 tons. Referring again to the engineers' method of giving to the public the character of traffic upon a stream, they report here 6,000 automobiles, at $945,950, or making it practically one-half, as I remember, very nearly, of the total valuation of that commerce. I was interested to find out where those automobiles ran, and I found they ran 3 miles across the river, ferried across, and that appears as one of the items of commerce upon that river. Now, Mr. Chairman, I was asked why I did not move to strike out the entire amount. There was $962,625 available October last. That is a very small proportion compared with the five million on the lower stretch of the river, but at the same time with that amount of money on hand here, by dividing this amount and saving $600,000 to the people of this country, it would benefit my people, who will be saved in taxation, and it will benefit the people of the whole country, even if we strike out only one-half of one item, and I am sure out there they will applaud you for it, because there is practically no traffic or very little traffic along the river at that point.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. GOULDEN. What portion of the gentleman's district borders this river?

Mr. FREAR. About 100 miles.

Mr. GOULDEN. What important ports has the gentleman upon the river?

Mr. FREAR. There as several places, but there is no important port along the river in Wisconsin except two or three, such as Alma and Prescott, but there is practically very little traffic along the river at that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 42, noes 48.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to another section of the Mississippi River to which I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to recur, to what page?

Mr. COLLIER. To page 31.

The CHAIRMAN. To page 31 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the amendment reported.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to five minutes, which the gentleman is to have, I will have no objection. I understand that is satisfactory to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have not waived objection to the amendment until it is reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to return to page 31 for the purpose of offering an amendment and that debate be limited to 5 minutes on the amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to hear the amendment read first for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 31, line 19, after the word "commission" insert the following: "Whose recommendation approved by the Chief of Engineers as appears from House document 667, second session, Sixty-third Congress, is hereby adopted."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I desire to state at the outset that the committee is familiar with this item.

It has been discussed on several occasions. It was discussed and voted on two years ago, and there was considerable discussion and three votes taken on this particular item in the last session of Congress.

However, for the benefit of those who were not present at that time, I will say that some work made by the Federal Government is causing an erosion of the harbor at Vicksburg, which has been there for 75 or 100 years. This harbor, in a short time, will be destroyed. Now, as to the fact of whether or not this project is meritorious, I will say that the district engineer stated it was meritorious, the Chief of Engineers and Board of Engineers stated it was meritorious, the Mississippi River Commission stated it was meritorious, and on three votes in this House it was decided it was meritorious, and when it went to the Senate it was inserted in one of the substitute bills that was offered there by a distinguished Senator who was fighting the rivers and harbors bill, but who accepted the Vicksburg amendment and made a special exception too. And I want to say this, that when the lump sum was made in the Senate last year—I hope I am not violating any traditions when I say it—one of the Senators who was fighting the bill generally, stated that an objection to the proposed lump-sum bill was that it would work an injustice in some instances, and notably that of the Vicksburg Harbor.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, this is not a new project, because this Vicksburg Harbor was put under the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission two years ago. It does not require one more dollar than is now appropriated in this bill. There are $5,000,000 appropriated in this bill to be spent under the supervision of the Mississippi River Commission, and this simply asks that of that $5,000,000, according to the report made by the Mississippi River Commission, according to the report made by the Chief of Engineers, and according to the report made by the Board of Engineers, that $125,000 of this sum be spent—for what? For a new project? No. To improve commerce and trade relations around Vicksburg? No; but for the purpose of stopping the damage caused by work done by the Federal Government, which is now going on and which has gone on for some time. This is not a new project. I do not want money for improvement, but what I really need and what I really ought to have is an injunction. I want to say to you that there is not a corporation in the land, there is not a private individual, who, if they had inflicted as great a damage upon the city of Vicksburg as that city has had inflicted on it by the Federal Government, and is still inflicting upon it, an injunction would lie against them and a suit for damages would be incurred. We are not increasing the cost of this bill one cent. We are simply asking, in accordance with what this House did last year on three separate votes—in the Committee of the Whole on two occasions and then on a separate vote in the House—to carry out the recommendation of the engineers and of the Mississippi River Commission and stop this damage. I am appealing to you, gentlemen, for the harbor that we have out there; a harbor we have had for 100 years. It is my home town. I live there and am familiar with the conditions, and I heard one of the Government engineers state that he believed that in less than 12 months, unless something was done, and that will be before we can bring in a new river and harbor bill—he believed that all the railroad communication of Vicksburg with the West will be destroyed, as that harbor is being gradually washed away. Compresses, warehouses, and other buildings are going into the river, and all on account of work done by the Federal Government. I want all you who believe in economy to bear in mind that we are not increasing this bill one cent, because this $125,000 will simply come from the $5,000,000 appropriation given to the Mississippi River Commission. This harbor is a part of the jurisdiction and under the control of the Mississippi River Commission. It was placed there two years ago. The banks of the canal at Vicksburg should be revetted. It is only fair and just that this money should be appropriated to take care of a damage, a continuing damage, caused by work done by the Government. There are $3,000,000 worth of property on those banks which are being destroyed through no fault of the people of Vicksburg, and the passage of this amendment will remedy those conditions. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 45.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. SPARKMAN and Mr. COLLIER took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the time has now arrived when the committee determined to return to the Chicago Harbor item, on page 30 of the bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAWLEY. What length of time was agreed on for debate on this item?

The CHAIRMAN. There was no time agreed on for debate, except that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] was recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall endeavor to present this case to the intelligence of the committee. On the part of Chicago I shall ask no favors. All I shall ask is justice. I want no man to vote for this proposition to whom it does not appeal. But I believe that we have a case that will justify every man in this House in voting for the amendment of my colleague, Mr. GALLAGHER, to authorize continuing contracts for a breakwater to protect the harbor which Chicago has constructed from the storms of the lake.

We are asking Congress for nothing in the way of cash. We are proposing that you give us the right to let a continuing contract to protect the investment already made by the city of Chicago.

Chicago's population, more than that of any other American city, comes from every section of the globe, but every impulse that moves its people is strictly American.

Chicago is an ever-moving, ever-shifting panorama where the life of the whole world is epitomized and in which all the forces of humanity are to be met.

London's streets are thronged with a busy multitude, but it has not so much of the rush and roar of busy life as has our own imperial city of the Central West, for there the hoof beat of the iron horse is continuous.

Over the 39 great trunk lines of railway which have their terminus in Chicago, representing over one-half the railroad mileage of America, running into every section of the Nation, more than 4,000 trains arrive and depart daily and carry to and from Chicago more than 500,000 people every 24 hours, enabling Chicago to keep its hand on the traffic of the continent and to note every pulse beat of the world.

Chicago is no ordinary city. Its commerce by water and by rail reaches fabulous figures. Chicago is in the geographical center of the Nation, on the borders of Lake Michigan, surrounded by the great bituminous coal fields of the Central West, in close proximity to the iron ore which is brought by water into the mills and sent by rail to every section of the Nation as finished product. It is the best labor market in America.

With this combination of advantages and the enterprise of its people, Chicago has forged ahead as no other city in all the world's history has.

It is surrounded by the richest agricultural region in the world. It is the distributing point for all America. Its population has grown to 2,500,000. Its people are aggressive, forceful, and patriotic. They ask the Government for nothing which they can do themselves. They have expended $60,000,000 in the construction of a great waterway 160 feet wide and 24 feet deep, on the banks of which there are 60 miles of municipally owned docks. The dock fronts in the heart of the city for three-fourths of a mile are owned by Chicago, and wharving privileges may be had along the face of these docks on equal terms by everybody who wishes to use them.

Chicago is constructing a great outer harbor, and this is the proposition that is before you to-night—a great outer harbor, not in the river but on the lake, beyond the confines of the river. On this great outer harbor the city of Chicago has already expended $4,000,000, and its plans contemplate an expenditure of $15,000,000 more of its own money. We ask nothing from the Government of the United States toward the construction of the harbor. The Government of the United States is asked only to protect the harbor from the storms on the lake by the construction of a breakwater.

It is the business of the Government to protect harbors built in cases like the one I have described, and this harbor can not be protected from the storms except by the construction of the breakwater which the amendment of my colleague [Mr. GALLAGHER] provides for. Can there be less cooperation expected of the Government than the construction of this breakwater? And is it just that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors should fail to appropriate the money required for the purpose in this bill? True, the bill as reported appropriates $200,000. But, mark you, this $200,000 which this bill appropriates was appropriated in 1910, when I was a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, for the purpose of repairing the Government-owned piers out on the lake at the base of Chicago's harbor, and for some unaccountable reason this money has never been used for the purpose for which it was appropriated in 1910, and the result is that the piers, built and owned by the Government, have been allowed to rot away, whereas if they were protected by the expenditure of this money which was appropriated for their repair they would be in as good a state of preservation to-day as they were on the day they were constructed. What excuse can be given for the failure to use this money I know not.

In addition to this $200,000 cash, so called, reappropriated from another fund, the committee authorizes a continuing contract for $374,000, to do what? To build a part of the breakwater to protect the harbor on which Chicago has expended $4,000,000, and in the completion of which it is likely to spend $15,000,000 more. Ah, that $374,000 might just as well be thrown in the lake, for it will not accomplish the object intended. There is only one way to protect the money expended by the city of Chicago and to protect the pier already constructed, and that is by adopting the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. GALLAGHER], a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Ah, you say, "We do not want amendments adopted to the bill," and none have been adopted to the bill so far. We are not asking for any money. This amendment provides for no money in this bill. It provides for authority to let a continuing contract to keep the faith of the Government with the State of Illinois and the city of Chicago, and that is all. What we need is the right to construct this breakwater, not part of the breakwater, but all of the breakwater, to protect 7,000 feet of dockage that we have by the expenditure of our own money made, so that ships that come to those docks may not be driven up on the wharves by the storms.

We are not asking this as a matter of favor, as I said before.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MADDEN. I am sorry to say I can not yield. I would be glad to yield if I had time.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I wanted to know what the entire breakwater was estimated to cost?

Mr. MADDEN. One million four hundred thousand dollars. We are asking the adoption of this amendment as a matter of right. Why the money was not used for the purpose for which it was appropriated, I am not able to say. Now comes the committee and recommends that it be diverted from the purpose for which it was originally appropriated, pretending to say that they are giving Chicago an appropriation of $200,000 for the construction of a breakwater to protect the harbor now in course of construction by the city.

What we need is the right to let the contracts for the construction of the breakwater—for all of the breakwater, not for part of the breakwater—for we have already constructed 7,000 feet of dockage at the point where the pier is to be protected, and unless the breakwater is constructed this 7,000 feet of dockage and the $4,000,000 that has been expended in its construction will be destroyed.

We are not asking this as a matter of favor. We are asking it as a matter of right. Chicago, with its 2,500,000 people, with its great harbor, its 13,275,320 tons of domestic water-borne commerce, and its 834,800 tons of foreign water-borne commerce, valued at hundreds of millions of dollars, ought not to be neglected, but should be given the protection to which its importance entitles it. It should be encouraged in its effort to facilitate the movement of the products of the factory and the farm by the creation of facilities which will reduce the cost of their movement.

Chicago is not asking the Government of the United States to create these facilities. Not at all. It is simply asking the Government to protect from the storms on the Lakes the facilities which Chicago itself and its people have willingly taxed themselves to create.

During the fiscal year of 1914 the State of Illinois paid into the Treasury of the United States $3,152,000 in corporation income tax and $2,076,000 in individual income tax, making a total net revenue from the State of Illinois from these two sources alone of $5,228,000, while its appropriation for rivers and harbors in this bill, including the continuing-contract provision, amounts to the sum of $734,000.

The State of Florida has $988,000 in this bill, and in 1914 it paid into the Treasury of the United States $92,958 in corporation income tax and $108,482 in individual income tax, making a total of $201,440.

The State of Louisiana has $122,000 in this bill, and it paid into the Treasury in 1914, $290,569 in corporation income tax and $148,151 in individual income tax, making a total of $438,720.

The State of North Carolina has $552,400 in this bill, and it paid into the Treasury in 1914, $173,267 in corporation income tax and $46,566 in individual income tax, making a total of $219,833.

The State of South Carolina has $125,500 in this bill, and it paid into the Treasury in 1914, $82,282 in corporation income tax and $25,751 in individual income tax, making a total of $108,033.

The State of Georgia has $707,500 in this bill, and it paid into the Treasury last year $247,774 in corporation income tax and $115,874 in individual income tax, making a total of $363,648.

The State of Texas has in this bill $2,103,500, and it paid the Government last year $551,241 in corporation tax and $360,927 in dividual income tax, making a total of $912,168.

The State of Arkansas has $186,000 in this bill, and it paid into the Treasury, in 1914, $95,796 in corporation income tax and $42,035 in individual income tax, a total of $137,831.

The State of Tennessee has $752,000 in this bill, and it paid last year $226,143 in corporation income tax and $98,274 in individual income tax, a total of $324,417.

The State of Mississippi has $992,500 in this bill, to say nothing whatever about the great Mississippi River appropriation, which ought not to be taken into account; and the State of Alabama, from which comes the great Democratic leader of the majority side of this House, has $1,053,000 in the bill, while the income tax from corporations and private individuals for the States of Mississippi and Alabama combined only amounted in 1914 to $324,417.

It will be seen that the corporation and individual income tax paid by the State of Illinois to the Federal Government in 1914 amounted to $5,228,000, while the combined amount paid by the States of Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama was but $3,131,100. [Applause.]

The total appropriation in this bill for rivers and harbors in the State of Illinois, including the $374,000 continuing-contract item, amounts to but $734,000—listen to this, gentlemen—while the appropriation for the States above enumerated amounts to $7,467,150. So that it will be seen that while the State of Illinois pays one-fourteenth of all the corporation and individual income tax of the United States it has but one-fiftieth of the amount recommended for appropriation in this bill, while the States of Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, combined, pay but one twenty-fifth of the corporation and income tax of the United States and have one-fifth of the entire amount appropriated in this bill.

Do you claim that to be justice? Truly the evidence is at hand that those who pay the most to maintain the Government are given the least consideration, no matter what their need.

Items without merit are lavishly provided for in this bill, while the item for the Chicago Harbor, with all its great commerce and the expenditure of fabulous sums by the municipality, is given scant consideration.

It might be added, for the information of the House, that Illinois, in addition to the income tax heretofore enumerated in my remarks, pays annually into the Treasury of the United States $55,000,000 in internal revenue, $11,000,000 customs duties, and $20,000,000 of a surplus over and above the expenses of its post office.

And yet we are told that the project presented by Chicago has no merit and ought not to be considered as worthy by the men on the Rivers and Harbors Committee, who represent 10 States that pay only one twenty-fifth of the income tax and have one-fifth of all the money appropriated in this great bill, while the State of Illinois pays one-fourteenth of the income tax and has but one-fiftieth of the money appropriated in the bill.

I tell you, gentlemen, the people of America are not going to stand for this sort of thing. They want justice. We propose to fight for justice. We come here to ask for no favors. We present the case to you on its merits. We ask you in the name of the honor of America to do justice to the greatest city on the American continent. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, we all like to hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] speak, and we are all personally very fond of him, especially the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, for he used to be a member of that committee. We admire him because he is one of the most attentive men to his duties in the House. We admire him because he is a good fighter, and if it had been possible to give him what he desires and to treat his project as we treated other projects throughout the country we would have given him what he asked for Chicago. The whole thing is summed up in this: There are a number of projects where continuing contracts have been asked for by the engineers. Chicago was one of them, and there are several others.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Chief of Engineers in his report asked for no continuing contract for Chicago.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I thought he did, but it seems I was mistaken to that extent. The Chief of Engineers asked for other continuing contracts. For instance, he asked for a continuing contract for a million dollars for the Delaware River. At Philadelphia is a commerce comparable with the great commerce of Chicago. If we are going to grant a continuing contract at Chicago, why should not we give it to the Delaware River? At the mouth of the Columbia River the engineers asked for a continuing contract of $2,316,000. Why should not we give that to them? The people of Portland pay a half a million dollars annually toward keeping the Columbia River navigable. The work for which they ask a continuing contract is, according to the engineers, the most difficult work in the country. We refused them. Why should we give it to Chicago? Why should Chicago be treated with more consideration than these people? We refused a continuing contract for Cape Lookout harbor of refuge of $2,136,000.

Now we have given Chicago every dollar that the engineers said they could spend in the next year. [Applause.] Is not that fair? My distinguished friend said that he wanted nothing in the bill but what is fair. We have given him every dollar that the engineers said that they could expend. We have done everything that they asked us to do. Why should we go ahead and take Chicago and make it an exception and favor it over every other project? I can not understand why. We took this matter up before the committee. We considered it carefully and we decided that there was no reason why the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] should be adopted.

Now, a word in regard to the argument that has been made about the vast amount of money that has gone to some States and the small amount that has gone to others. It seems to me that that must strike every man here as an unfair argument. You might as well argue that the State of Washington should not receive any more money for coast defenses than the State of Iowa. It would be no more ridiculous than that the river and harbor appropriation should be made according to States and population. You are supposed to spend river and harbor appropriations where there are rivers and harbors to improve, and you might as well say that the coast States get too large an amount out of the naval bill for navy yards. Some men might as well when the Navy bill is being considered come in and say that they have not been used fairly because they have a navy yard in Washington and they have none in Indiana.

Now, I want to impress upon you the fact that we have treated Chicago as we have treated every other project. We recognize the greatness of that city and we are doing everything we can to help it. We have given them every dollar they asked for.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman states that the committee has given the city of Chicago all the money the engineers asked for. Are they erecting these improvements that the gentleman from Illinois spoke about? Is the money being used?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; they are erecting it and completing it as fast as they can.

Mr. CRISP. All the gentleman from Illinois wants is a continuing project to complete the work that is now going on?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They want a continuing contract. In other words, they want to obligate the Government to that contract and have an advantage over every other project. They are not willing to take their chances with the other great projects in the country. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will only detain the committee a few minutes. I am sorry that my friend, Mr. GALLAGHER, a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, has offered this amendment, because, among other reasons, it is something entirely unnecessary, as far as the prosecution of work on the project is concerned. We have allowed in this bill the sum of $574,000 in cash.

Mr. MADDEN. Not cash?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; in cash.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Three hundred and seventy-four thousand dollars is for continuing contracts. Two hundred thousand dollars is $200,000 that was appropriated in 1910.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, not at all.

Mr. MADDEN. Two hundred thousand dollars appropriated in 1910.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will explain that. There is nothing for a continuing contract. When we came to consider this matter we found that the Chief of Engineers had recommended as follows:

> Of the balance available, less the amount covered by uncompleted contracts, to wit, $619,146.02, but $275,700 is available for the work of extending the exterior breakwater; the remainder, $343,446.02, is available for maintenance only, and it is probable that of this last amount $200,000 will not be required for maintenance during the next two years. Legislation is suggested which will make this $200,000 available for the extension of the exterior breakwater.

So, recommending as they did, that $374,000 be appropriated in cash and $200,000 of the amount already appropriated for another purpose but available for work on the Chicago Harbor be made available, we did that very thing, making in all $574,000 in cash for work to be done there during the period covered by the estimates furnished us by the War Department for this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in furnishing that amount, as I said a moment ago, we have furnished the entire amount recommended as sufficient. The Chief of Engineers recommended no continuing contract. And let me say right here that not a soul appeared before our committee when we were considering the provisions of this bill in behalf of Chicago Harbor. We did have the matter up before us, however, on the estimates furnished, but there was no request coming from anyone except the member of the committee from Illinois, who requested that this cash sum be appropriated; and in face of the opposition by another person, a citizen of Chicago—who by the way was the only person who appeared before our committee opposing any item in the bill—in the face of the opposition by that person we did allow the entire amount recommended by the engineers. After it was all over, after this bill was reported to the House, after it had lain here quite a time, there appeared before us parties for the first time asking this continuing contract. I then again consulted the Chief of Engineers, who said finally that no more money was needed to carry on the work for the period covered by the estimates.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we vote this in, we will vote in a sum of money that the engineers say they do not need. It, of course, would be on hand as an authorization, but they say they do not need it. If we are going to have another bill in the next Congress, as we expect to have——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Furthermore, if we allow this amendment, we will be doing something for this harbor that we have not done and are not proposing to do for any other harbor or any other project in the country. Why should we do it? There is absolutely no justification for such action. There is, Mr. Chairman, no intention to discriminate against that great harbor and we are not doing so. Another thing. They are not proposing just at this time to build all five of those docks, but let me say what our conclusion was as to that.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Just one moment. There was a question before us as to whether the city of Chicago proposed to complete all her proposed improvements. The gentleman who came before us in opposition said the city did not intend to do so. He contended that they did not intend to build but one pier where they had proposed to build five. But we thought that should make no difference. We thought that if they built even one pier there at a cost of $4,000,000, as they tell us they will, we would be justified in going ahead with the work. That independent of the pier, the harbor was worth protecting even at the cost of the proposed work.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will.

Mr. POWERS. Is it not a fact that the Rivers and Harbors Committee has not in any instance given more than the amount of the recommendation of the engineers?

Mr. SPARKMAN. We have not, and often have fallen much below the estimate.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SPARKMAN. How much time does the gentleman desire? The committee has the right to close.

Mr. GALLAGHER. We are not closing yet.

Mr. SPARKMAN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. GALLAGHER. About four or five minutes; five minutes. I just simply want to correct some statements which have been made here.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent to close debate if we can. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 12 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto end in 12 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Connecticut was to have five minutes if he wanted it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Why, Mr. Chairman, what sort of legerdemain is going on? [Laughter.] Will there be any doubt about my position on this matter?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I asked the gentleman a civil question but did not receive a civil answer; perhaps, however, it is as good as he can do, and I, for that reason, will excuse him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent——

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the gentleman from Connecticut wants any time I will include him in the request. I asked him if he wanted any time.

Mr. MANN. Make it 17 minutes and that will give the gentleman from Connecticut 5 minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto end in 17 minutes, 5 minutes to go to the gentleman from Illinois, 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut, 3 to the gentleman from Texas, and 3——

Mr. MANN. That makes 16 minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Three minutes to myself or anyone to whom I may yield. I will reserve three minutes to myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 16 minutes, 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut, 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas, and the chairman reserves 3 minutes. Is there objection? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, as my friend and colleague [Mr. MADDEN] stated, we in Illinois pay into the Treasury of the United States annually more than twice the aggregate of all the appropriations provided for in this rivers and harbors bill. The chairman was correct when he stated that there was no one here from Chicago who appeared before the committee asking for an appropriation for this proposed improvement. We have, however, built a pier projecting 3,000 feet into the lake, and we have expended $4,000,000 upon it up to date. The storms of Lake Michigan are at times terrific. The city authorities in Chicago became alarmed at the menace of these storms and were fearful that the pier might be washed away. The heads of all the city departments of Chicago did come to Washington and, with myself, waited upon the chairman, asking that this amendment be included in the bill for a continuing contract so that this work could be protected from the elements. We do not ask that anything be added to the bill. We are not raising the total amount of the bill. We are here asking simply for a continuing authorization. The chairman of the committee, my good friend [Mr. SPARKMAN], would not misrepresent us intentionally, but he stated that the engineers have not asked for this continuing appropriation.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I said the Chief of Engineers had not.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Well, here is the report of the Chief of Engineers, part 2, and I am reading from page 2923.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that part 1 is where the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers appears.

Mr. DONOVAN. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman from Florida has no business to interrupt the gentleman who has the floor without his permission or addressing the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is not objecting, and as long as the gentleman from Illinois does not object——

Mr. DONOVAN. It does not belong to the gentleman from Illinois; it belongs to any gentleman to raise a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, I am reading from the report of the engineers, United States Army, 1914, on page 2923 of the report, and this is what I am going to call attention to. What he says:

> Attention is also invited to the desirability of a continuing-contract authorization.

The Chief of Engineers is speaking of this particular work—this very breakwater proposition. Now, listen:

> It is not enough to be reasonably sure that sufficient annual appropriations will follow one another. No contractor can do the work most economically, and therefore at least cost to the United States unless he can provide a proper plant and amortize it, or a large part of it, in the execution of a contract for the entire job. If no continuing contract be authorized the next appropriation should be relatively large, inasmuch as the caisson method of construction requires a relatively large preliminary outlay for plant, of course with correspondingly smaller expenditures later.

Now, that is the report of the engineer——

Mr. BURGESS. Who signed that report?

Mr. GALLAGHER. That is the report of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. BURGESS. That is, the district officer?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Oh, no; that is the report on which we have been building this bill. Now, Mr. Chairman, we are not asking any favor. We are not seeking additional money for this work; but we want to be sure that this harbor which is being built for the people of our city shall be amply protected. One of the greatest troubles with all of the appropriations for river and harbor purposes is the lack of provision by the Government or by local authorities for sufficient harbor space to accommodate boats which do not belong to steamboat and shiping combinations, and thus relieve these independent boats from charges which amount practically to a confiscation of the profits on their cargoes. That is what we are trying to do in Chicago by the construction of municipal docks.

Now, there is not any question as to the necessity for this amendment to protect the work that we are doing, and I hope the Members of this House will at least encourage us in setting an example to the rest of the country to build municipal harbors. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. I do not want to speak on the amendment, but I want to speak on the main proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for five minutes if he wants it. If he does not, the Chair will proceed.

Mr. DONOVAN. I did not want to speak to the amendment after it was disposed of. I want to speak to the main proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The unanimous-consent agreement does not apply to that. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BURGESS. The report which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] read is the report of Col. Judson, the district officer, and he invites the attention to the desirability of a continuing-contract organization. But here is what the Chief of Engineers says:

> Of the balance available, less the amount covered by uncompleted contracts, to wit, $619,146.02, but $275,700 is available for the work of extending the exterior breakwater; the remainder, $343,446.02, is available for maintenance only, and it is probable that of this last amount $200,000 will not be required for maintenance during the next two years. Legislation is suggested which will make this $200,000 available for the extension of the exterior breakwater.

And then he goes on and sets out the different amounts and winds up with the amount that can be profitably spent in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, for works of improvement, $574,000. The bill is in exact accord with the recommendations of the chief. It appropriates $374,000 straight out, and diverts the $200,000, according to his suggestion, to the construction of the breakwater. I will read it:

Harbor at Chicago, Ill.: Continuing improvement, by the construction of a breakwater to form an outer harbor, $374,000: Provided, That of the amount now on hand and available for rebuilding superstructure of existing breakwaters, $200,000, or so much thereof as may be deemed advisable, may, upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, be transferred by the Secretary of War and made available for extension of the outer breakwater.

Now, the question is simply this: Chicago is a great city. She has a great people and has great Representatives here, but she is not entitled to any better treatment than any other place. And the income-tax size-up of the situation is all beside the question. If we made up a river and harbor bill according to the income-tax assessments, we would be laughed at and ridiculed all over the country, and we ought to be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield my three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent if the gentleman from Connecticut is not going to use his five minutes, that I may have the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that, if the gentleman from Connecticut does not desire to use his five minutes, he be permitted to use the same. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to oppose anything proposed by my friend from Chicago, the distinguished gentleman with whom I served many years on the River and Harbor Committee, but I hope this amendment will not be agreed to. There is no special reason why it should be. The project is going to be prosecuted just as rapidly without the amendment as it would be with the amendment. We have provided all the cash that is necessary to carry it on for a year, and that is all the cash he wants, and at the end of the year we will provide cash enough to carry it on to completion.

As suggested by my colleague from Texas [Mr. BURGESS], the question of income-tax receipts has nothing to do with it. If we should apportion these appropriations according to the income-tax receipts, we would have a "pork hogshead" instead of a "pork barrel," with New York, perhaps, and Chicago getting all of it. But we appropriate money not according to States, but according to the project.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors did not build or locate the rivers and harbors of this country. God did that. He put them wherever we find them. We appropriate money for the boll weevil, but we do not appropriate any of it for expenditure in Illinois. We appropriate money for the reclamation of arid lands in the West, but none of it is used in New England. We appropriate money for the extermination of the gypsy moth in New England, but none of it is expended in Mississippi. We appropriate for these things where the money can be profitably and sensibly expended for the benefit of the whole people, and when a gentleman tells us how much Chicago has already of this world's goods I suppose he intends to invoke the text contained in the Good Book, to the effect that: "Unto him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken even that which he hath." [Laughter and applause.]

I hope this committee will take no such view as that, because if we followed that there are sections of the country in which I am interested that I fear would not fare any too well. I think gentlemen should be contented with what they are entitled to, and that is what is provided in the bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. I will be entitled to my five minutes on the main proposition after this amendment is decided, will I not?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir. The gentleman is entitled to no time now under the agreement.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a further inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Under the rules it is required that those who address the House shall speak on the subject matter. Of course no one can speak here properly unless he speaks to the amendment. Is not that true?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; if a point of order is made.

Mr. DONOVAN. Exactly; and therefore my time should go to the main proposition after the amendment is decided.

The CHAIRMAN. By agreement the gentleman from Connecticut was awarded five minutes' time on this paragraph, which he did not take. All time has expired.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, line 12, after the word "breakwater," insert the following: "And provided further, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary to construct the breakwater, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $1,490,300, inclusive of amounts herein appropriated or made available and the amounts heretofore appropriated."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GALLAGHER. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois calls for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 75.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mississippi River from St. Paul to Minneapolis, Minn.: Continuing improvement, $235,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, it has become apparent to the Members of this House that this bill is going to pass. It strikes me, in so far as I am able to see, that the bill has been well considered by the committee. I want to make this suggestion that the industrious Members of this House who see fit to take up so much time in pointing out various objections to this bill should be allowed to extend their remarks in the RECORD. [Applause.] They should be allowed from now until March 4 to extend their remarks, and the rules should be waived so as to permit the insertion of "loud, long, and continuous applause."

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. BLACKMON. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. Does the gentleman suggest that they be allowed to revise and extend their remarks?

Mr. BLACKMON. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. Will you allow the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] to come in on that?

Mr. BLACKMON. Yes; I would like to see the gentleman come in as often as he chooses. This bill is going to pass, Mr. Chairman, and I hope Members will agree with me, and that my suggestion may be adopted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I send up an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment. The Chair will state that the committee have passed the paragraph to which the gentleman's amendment is offered.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I desire to revert to line 9, page 32.

Mr. MANN. Ask unanimous consent.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent to revert to line 9, page 32, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. POWERS. I object to that.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman reserve his objection a moment?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what the amendment is, but it is only fair to say that Members generally thought that a certain amount of time would be taken on the Chicago Harbor item, and possibly they were taken advantage of by the fact that we postponed that and read this portion before anyone had a right to suppose we would reach it. Hence I think it is fair to give the gentleman an opportunity to offer his amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I want to say that the gentleman from Arkansas was not taken by surprise, because his attention was called to the matter, and he was asked if he had anything to say.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It is now 5 minutes after 9 o'clock. I came here this morning at 11 o'clock, and I was not out of this Hall, except to get a little lunch about 3 o'clock, until I was called out of the Hall when this paragraph was read, but returned as soon as I could.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman, in all fairness, ought to be permitted to offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let his amendment be reported first, then we can tell.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment may be reported for information.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent to have it reported for information.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be reported for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 9, after the word "river," insert a semicolon and the following:

"Provided further, That the said Mississippi River Commission is hereby authorized to close the gap in the levees between the Mississippi River levee in Arkansas and the Arkansas River levee at Cypress Creek, at a cost not to exceed $125,000, out of the money herein appropriated."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to this paragraph of the bill for the purpose of offering the amendment?

Mr. EDWARDS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

Mr. MANN. Oh, do not object.

Mr. EDWARDS. I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, this proposed amendment does not carry one dollar additional in the bill. It merely authorizes the Mississippi River Commission to expend the sum of $125,000 out of the $5,000,000 lump sum set aside to the commission to use as it sees fit. The cost of this levee will be about $225,000. This gap in the levees is in the line between my district and that of my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas]. The people of these two districts will themselves pay the additional $125,000. To-day they are paying a tax of about 4 per cent, as I recall. They are paying for protection which they do not receive.

Now, what are the facts? The Mississippi Levee and the Arkansas River Levee approach within about a mile and a quarter of each other. Between these two levees flows Cypress Creek. If the Mississippi River reaches a flood stage great torrents of water, a veritable flood, flow through this gap, overflowing a great part of Desha County in Mr. TAYLOR's district, and all of Chicot County in my district, and likewise about five or six parishes in the State of Louisiana. All this is backwater from the Mississippi River going up Cypress Creek and around the Mississippi Levee system.

As I have just stated, this appropriation does not carry one dollar of additional money as set forth in the bill, but is a part and parcel of the $5,000,000 lump sum set aside to be expended by the commission. When you go before the Mississippi River Commission, as Senator CLARKE and I did a year ago last summer, going from here, and a great number of people coming from Mr. TAYLOR's district and my district, the Mississippi River Commission say, as they said then, substantially, "If Congress would specifically authorize this to be done, we would do it"; but the commission are called upon, here and there and yonder, to make appropriate expenditures; not that this is inappropriate at all, but it seems they have never been able to reach this particular gap.

Now, I submit that the Mississippi River channel is the proper artery through which this water should flow. The people in that vicinity have constructed at great cost an artificial channel to divert the water coming down Cypress Creek, and are willing and prepared to care for this water; but what they object to is this backwater which comes from the Mississippi River through the gap and around their levees.

In 1913, when the Mississippi was at flood stage, although the gauge at Arkansas City did not show the river to be nearly so high as during the overflow period of 1912, the water coming through this gap did as much or more damage in this section than the awful Panther Forest break in 1912. A delegation of citizens from my district testified as to these conditions before the Rivers and Harbors Committee last December, and members of the committee will doubtless recall the statements of Judge H. C. Cook, of Chicot County; Mr. C. Warfield, president of the levee board; and Mr. J. P. Breckenridge, the levee engineer.

I know my good friend from Mississippi, Mr. HUMPHREYS, will oppose this amendment. I would not charge him with any selfish interest in the matter because, generally speaking, he is fairly altruistic, to say the least, and way down in his heart he might think that if this great volume of water went into the channel of the Mississippi River instead of flowing over the homes, farms, and plantations of Arkansas and Louisiana it might create some pressure against the levees on the Mississippi side, although the levees on the Arkansas side would share a like pressure.

I submit, gentlemen of the House, that the Mississippi River is the proper channel through which this water should flow. It should go down that stream and not over the farms and plantations of Arkansas and Louisiana. I think I have fairly stated the case. I am not a member of the committee; I am not as potential with the committee as my friend and neighbor across the river, the gentleman from Mississippi, who is a member of this committee. I am not powerful enough to have the committee do anything. The committee, I suppose, feels a little sore because I have criticized some of the items of the bill; but in doing so I am a better friend to proper river legislation than those whose silence is the price of favoritism.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I stand for river improvement. I made my first campaign not in the bottom counties of my district alone, for I have not many of these counties, but I emphasized the importance of river improvements over the whole country. I make no proud boast, as do some gentlemen, of having great reputation anywhere, but I am known in my State to be extremely in favor of proper river improvements. I submit that when this vote is taken I want you to remember that the Mississippi River is the channel through which the water should flow and not over the plantations and farms in Arkansas and Louisiana. This is not a new item, but is a levee item to be properly cared for by the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I might state for the benefit of the gentleman from Arkansas that I never went before the Mississippi River Commission in my life and asked them to allot a dollar to my district, and I never expect to as long as I remain in Congress.

I insist that if we are going to create a commission of engineers and give them $5,000,000 to spend we ought not to tell them where the money is to be spent. If we did, we ought to abolish the commission. We give the commission $5,000,000 and tell them to go down on the Mississippi and spend the money where, in their judgment, it ought to be expended. Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana and all other States must take their chances.

They do not build levees on the Yazoo; that flows into the Mississippi River, but they require my constituents to take care of that themselves. The Arkansas flows into the Mississippi. Why should it have preference? We appropriate $5,000,000, a large part of which is to protect the Arkansas delta. My judgment is that the people of Arkansas ought to build these auxiliary or lateral levees, or at least, to let the commission exercise its discriminating judgment. That is what we have to do in my district. The Mississippi River Commission has the authority to do this work now. It is authorized to do it, but what the gentleman wants and what he hopes the Mississippi River Commission will construe his amendment as meaning, is that the commission, whether it meets with their judgment or not, whether it is in the interest of the flood protection or navigation, is hereby directed to expend the money on the Arkansas River at the point indicated. How many Members of this House know whether it ought to be expended there or not? Here we have a commission composed of officers of the Army, from civil life, and from the Coast and Geodetic Survey, who have studied this question for years, and who go up and down the river constantly to see where it should be properly expended. The gentleman wants Congress, in the fullness of its ignorance of the subject, to tell these experts where and how to spend the money.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOODWIN) there were 28 ayes and 37 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 16 and 17 on page 32.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, strike out lines 16 and 17.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this is a project that has had in appropriations $254,600. We are proposing to give $235,000 in addition to the amount available last October, $216,624. I wish to present briefly a statement from a letter which I received, coming from a former editorial writer on the Pioneer Press, the largest newspaper in the northwestern country for many years, and also editor of other papers:

2219 KNAPP STREET,
St. Paul, Minn, December 9, 1914.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I want to thank you for the copy sent me of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

For many years I have recognized in "pork-barrel" methods the very worst obstruction to the progress of national waterway improvement. When the people see vast sums wasted on "fake" improvements, like that in "Dam No. 2" in the Mississippi at this point, they naturally lose faith in waterway improvement as a whole.

I want to suggest the following as an effective mode of testing the sincerity of those Congressmen who are asking big appropriations for insignificant streams and harbors in their respective States:

Let every appropriation by Congress for such improvement be conditioned on the appropriation, by the State in which it is located, of at least one-half as much as is to be paid from the National Treasury. If they really believe the improvement will be worth as much as is claimed for it the Congressmen interested can hardly refuse to accept so liberal a condition.

I believe, in fact, that almost all river and harbor improvements should be carried through by cooperation between States and nations. The example of Illinois in appropriating $20,000,000 for the Lakes to the Gulf scheme, and of New York in voting $120,000,000 for the enlarged Erie Canal, should shame into silence those who would place upon the Federal Treasury the entire burden of improvements, the benefits of which are purely local.

Very truly, yours, C. R. BARNS.

I wrote practically all the waterway editorials which appeared in the Pioneer Press for nearly 14 years.

I do not know the gentleman personally, but upon the receipt of the letter I have some knowledge of this project, which is not far from my own home. I wish to call attention to the engineer's report, on page 935, giving a justification for this expense, which already has amounted to $2,354,000. It is for building a dam between St. Paul and Minneapolis 30 feet high. The engineer says:

The construction of the lock and dam may develop passenger traffic between St. Paul and Minneapolis, and it is expected to reduce the freight rate on flour and grain shipped from Minneapolis.

That is the project to which the gentleman refers in the letter. I will say in regard to the passenger traffic—this is written by the engineers, so that Members here can determine for themselves the value to be placed upon the report—St. Paul and Minneapolis are only 10 miles apart. Traveling on a street car, it takes about half an hour or a little more. The street cars are great, large cars, two or three times as large as those on the streets here, and they run every five minutes on two different lines; and there are eight trunk lines running between the two; yet the engineers say that it is for the purpose of developing passenger traffic. And it would ordinarily take half an hour to get to the boat and half an hour to get back from the boat in order to make the trip. It would take nearly half an hour to go through the locks and half to three-quarters of an hour to travel up the current of the river. Yet the engineers say to us seriously—with 8 trunk lines and 2 street car lines with 50,000 people going to and from every day at 10 cents each—that there is a hope of developing a passenger traffic.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. I have heard the gentleman make this statement several times about the railroads being accessible. If I understand the waterway movement, it is for the purpose of affording competition with the railroads—not necessarily against them, but competition with them. Do I understand the gentleman, from what he has just said and from what I have heard him say before, to mean that he would prefer to see no waterway competition at all because the railroads can carry the freight?

Mr. FREAR. No; certainly not. I am endeavoring to show to the gentleman and to the committee that it is the greatest absurdity that has ever been presented to say that any possible passenger traffic can exist for this reason. The street cars carry the passengers from one city to the other for 10 cents. In order to take the boats you would have to pay 5 cents to go down to the boat and 5 cents to get back from it, losing all the time in transferring on the boat.

Mr. MOORE. Let us take freight, bulky matter.

Mr. FREAR. I am speaking of this passenger traffic first. I am going to refer to the other.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman has raised a very important question and I do not want him to be misunderstood. I do not take it that the gentleman is an advocate of the railroads as against water competition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. I have only one or two small items to which I desire to direct attention.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. I understand the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] would like some time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; I have something to address to this item and to the previous item. I would like to have 10 minutes, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. And I hope the House will hear him.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I want to say to the gentleman that if we are going to get through this bill to-night, and we are going to stay here until we do, we are taking up a good deal of time.

Mr. MANN. This is reasonable debate.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes—5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. FREAR, 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. STEVENS, and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. SMITH.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's statement would seem to indicate that where there are railroads he would prefer there should be no water competition.

Mr. FREAR. No, Mr. Chairman, I have shown the utter absurdity in this case of any possible competition by water in passenger rates with street cars, where it only costs 10 cents to go between the two towns. Naturally, we desire reduced rates wherever possible to secure them and wherever the traffic warrants such expenditures. It is a waste of time of the House to discuss it further, I fear. Of course, the gentleman does not mean that seriously.

Mr. MOORE. It would apply to a river like the Hudson where the railroads parallel the river on either side. Would the gentleman say there should be no improvement of the river to afford water competition?

Mr. FREAR. No; I did not oppose the Hudson River appropriation. I do question the proposed surveys covering the two projects, one a 27-foot depth and the other a 30-foot depth, for the Hudson River, which would involve an expense of possibly ten to thirty million dollars, to be ascertained if both projects were put into force. There is only one other thing. I spoke of the absolute absurdity of the engineers' recommendation on this matter. I believe there can be no passenger traffic there.

I have occasionally gone up to Minnehaha on the boat, and, as far as any business is concerned, it is impossible to compete between the cities by waterway traffic. On the question of freight rates on flour and grain, I would not care to express an opinion, because that is in the future. No one can tell; but I will say this, Mr. Chairman, that last year there was brought from New Orleans to the city of St. Paul a boat, traveling the whole length of the Mississippi River. The gentleman who had the boat was entertained by a committee of business men at St. Paul. I recollect quite well the character of his remarks at that time. He brought his boat from New Orleans, and he was feasted, and the banqueters expressed the hope that he would continue in the business. They were very kind to him, but they did not give him business, and he said to them in a speech, "You have done everything except the one thing that is necessary—you have not given me any return cargo." Now, that is the only case to my knowledge of a boat going from New Orleans to St. Paul in recent years, and I doubt if any boats have gone down the entire length of the river. Of course, we have hopes of the future, but we have a 30-foot dam and lock, and, as I said, it is a matter of speculation. We are going on with it, and we have to look to the future. I presume we ought to finish it as long as we have gotten so far along with it, but it is an absurdity and absolutely ridiculous from present prospects to speak of passenger traffic, because there is none.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. Did the gentleman state that the Government had spent on this stretch of river some $2,000,000?

Mr. FREAR. Two million two hundred and fifty-four thousand six hundred dollars has been appropriated.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the tonnage on that stretch now?

Mr. FREAR. There is absolutely nothing. The only traffic is by an excursion steamer to Minnehaha Creek. The engineer's report says:

The statistics of the excursion business done could not be obtained. The rafting of logs below Minneapolis has ceased.

That is found on page 2483 of the engineer's report. I have made the motion in order to present the facts set forth by the report on this project. As I stated at the outset, the Government has made large expenditures at this point, and I have presented all the facts that appear from the engineer's report.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have an opportunity briefly to discuss the item now before the committee and the one previously considered by the committee concerning the $1,200,000 for the improvement of the upper Mississippi River, and I think the committee should realize the seriousness of the situation and the great importance of this item to the North Central States at the present time. Three years ago the Interstate Commerce Commission considered the subject of transcontinental rates in connection with the intermountain rate cases, and in the course of its decision Commissioners Prouty and Lane set forth the fact that 75 per cent of the goods in the competitive territory between the Mississippi Valley and the Pacific coast was furnished from the Central West or the Mississippi Valley and 25 per cent of that freight and goods was furnished from the Atlantic coast. The Panama Canal is now open. In August last the freight rates from coast to coast were reduced from 20 to 50 per cent upon this competitive traffic by the American Hawaiian Co., which has 23 first-class ships in commission. The transcontinental railroads find themselves unable to and have refused to meet those rates, because they can not meet those rates and exist under existing traffic conditions. The commission held in these intermountain rate cases that of that competitive freight 93 per cent was capable of being carried by water and only 7 per cent was necessarily carried by land. So that the great bulk of that competitive traffic can be produced on the Atlantic coast, transported through the Panama Canal, and distributed throughout the competitive territory eastward from the Pacific coast in preference to competitive goods of the Central West, because such goods can be laid down cheaper because of the cheaper rates through the Panama Canal than overland by the transcontinental lines. Similar conditions necessarily will arise in the distribution of Pacific coast products. They can be shipped cheaper by the canal and from the Atlantic coast than they can be had over the railroads. This course of business will diminish the distributing territory of the cities of the Central West and give a corresponding advantage to the coast and eastern competitors.

You are aware that very recently the Interstate Commerce Commission have made a 5 per cent increase on class rates in eastern territory. There is also pending right now before the Interstate Commerce Commission another proceeding in which an additional increase of rates is sought on class freight from eastern points to the north Mississippi River points, and I think a hearing was had this week. The railroad owning the Lake freight lines for package goods have increased the lake and rail rates so that no longer can the North Central States receive the advantage that they formerly had and properly should have by reason of the Lake rates and the large public expenditures upon Lake improvements. Under these circumstances it is to be expected that the former 75 per cent of the competitive traffic which the Central States have enjoyed in the competitive States between that region and the Pacific coast, will be reduced from 75 per cent to 25 per cent, while the Eastern States—the coast States—probably will increase their percentage from 25 to 75. That is rather to be expected, because of the tremendous decrease of rate on account of the Panama Canal. The result will be that the industries and interests of the Central West, on account of cheap rates from coast to coast and the inability of the transcontinental railroads to meet those rates, will be injured, and tremendously injured, as to that competitive traffic.

I neglected to state that the railroads from Chicago west have already initiated and that there is now pending a readjustment of rates to the Pacific coast so that they can compete through that western territory with the Panama Canal rates. That matter is now pending before the commission, and upon it is the hope of many industries in the Central West.

But the difficulty is that the fourth section of the interstate-commerce act—the long and short haul clause—will probably control, and if strictly construed may not enable the Central West territory to compete with the eastern territory. The intermediate country and its people will probably bitterly complain of any reductions of through freight in which they can not participate and that may influence the commission. The result will be that the territory from Pittsburgh eastward will have rates not to exceed 45 or 46 cents a hundred first class to the Pacific coast, and Chicago and Mississippi River territory will have rates of 60 cents a hundred on corresponding traffic to the Pacific coast. There now seems to be only one possible method of relief to the Central West, and that is by the use of the Mississippi River. [Applause.]

So I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], who has done his best to throttle his own territory, to decrease the value of the lands of his own people, to prevent the extension of its own resources, and prevent the development of the industries of his splendid people, to what will happen. Unless we can get an improvement and a reduction of rates by way of or on account of the Mississippi River, we no longer can compete as we formerly have in the territory in the Intermountain States or the Pacific coast. That means a reduction of our business, a deterrent to our growth, and a failure to well utilize the wonderful resources of our favored region.

Now, what is the reason that we can not? Years ago there was a splendid traffic on the Mississippi River. Last winter a year ago a subcommittee of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee had an interview with the captains of the Mississippi River steamboats in the hearing concerning the dam at Keokuk, and I asked those men why they did not carry freight on the Mississippi River. They told me—and I think the members of the committee heard it—that much freight was offered them, but they were compelled to refuse it. There were two reasons for it. In the first place, the steamboats had not the capacity to carry it. In the second place, there were no proper terminals in the cities on the river.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] spoke of the barge going up the Mississippi River from New Orleans to St. Paul and that no return cargo was provided. It did go up the river—an open barge with tarpaulin cover. It did not protect any perishable goods; so that it was impossible to get insurance on any freight, and merchants did not dare to ship valuable goods in that way on the river unless they could get insurance on them and have them properly protected against the elements. The kind of traffic from that region requires such protection. It was not a modern barge; it was an old open barge. The committee well knows that last October the Engineer Corps submitted a report on a modern system of barges for use upon the Mississippi River. Five years ago the National Waterways Commission made a trip to Germany, and there we investigated—and the chairman of the committee will well remember it—the kind of barges used in Germany and the splendid experimental system there by which is produced the best possible type of barge for traffic. And Congress directed that experiments should be made upon the Mississippi as to the sort of barges that would be best suited for use on the Mississippi River that could be produced and described.

A report was made last October—a very valuable one—and forms of barges were submitted to Congress, for the benefit of the country, that would result in the cheapest and best kind of transportation on that river. That report further showed that by the use of those barges the rates can probably be reduced to about a mill and a half up to about 4 mills per ton per mile. This is the hope you realize. The average rail rate in that valley is 7⅞ to 8 mills or so per ton per mile. Of course, the water rate must be increased by terminal charges, haulage, insurance, and the like, which will thus at least approximate the rail rate.

Now, if the engineers' estimates on those experimental barges can be justified, freight can be carried from New Orleans to St. Paul and Minneapolis, from Pittsburgh to St. Paul and Minneapolis, and enable those cities and that great stretch of country to compete with the Pacific coast rate and business. The Mississippi points are not the only ones so affected. That great stretch of territory, covering more than seven States, covering probably several hundred thousand square miles, and containing 7,000,000 or so of people, and with thousands of millions of business annually, is greatly affected by the use of this river, by this possible reduction of rate, and by the consequent improvement in transportation facilities.

Why, gentlemen, the reasons the Mississippi River has not been used for the past few years are several in number: First, because business methods have not been adopted in the handling of river traffic as compared with the superb system of the railroads. A new corporation is under formation in New Orleans, and a new corporation has been formed in Kansas City, and a new corporation is being formed in Minneapolis and St. Paul to use these barges and other means of transportation which I have described to you.

These men mean business, because it is their life to have their business carried on in a proper way and to the best possible advantage.

Again, river traffic has been compelled to frequently transfer; traffic has been compelled to shift from water to rail and from rail to water, and this has been destructive. These barges will have through traffic from Pittsburgh and New Orleans to the headwaters of the Mississippi and upper points on the Missouri. In that way by proper business methods, through shipments, and first-class terminals, a great saving can be effected. Insurance can be had, and the minor charges can be reduced or eliminated. Congress has already provided two things, first, that railroads can not reduce rates in order to throttle this traffic, because if they do they will be compelled to so maintain those rates when so reduced, unless other causes intervene; and, second, railroads must make through rates and connections with water lines where business warrants. The Interstate Commerce Commission has full authority to compel this.

The city of Minneapolis last year manufactured over 18,000,000 barrels of flour. It is the largest primary market for flour in the world. In the adjacent country tributary to the Twin Cities there is probably manufactured 10,000,000 barrels more. There is consumed in those cities many million tons of coal, which can be brought up that river. Vast amounts of raw materials and heavy, bulky products are used in these populous centers. For that reason our people are confident that the river ought to be used, and can be used, and will be used if Congress will give it a chance. [Applause.]

Now, just a word about that dam which has been criticized. I am responsible more than any other man for its present situation, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has kindly supported and put into legislative form the efforts that our people have made. That system of dams, formerly embracing two dams, was started 20 years ago, before I entered Congress. It was soon found that one dam of 30-foot lift would furnish much better navigation and in addition would furnish valuable water power, sufficient to pay for the project. Accordingly Congress, after considering the matter carefully, did discard the upper dam, at a loss of several hundred thousand dollars, and the lower dam will be increased in height and completed by the expenditure of the $235,000 which this bill carries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If the committee will allow me two minutes I will be glad to proceed.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for two minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objecion.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. This dam will be completed next September if this money be furnished. When completed it will carry navigation to Minneapolis. My colleague, Judge SMITH, will describe what the city of Minneapolis is doing for its navigation. That dam can be used for water power, and in the course of years every single cent will be paid back to the Treasury. It would be provided now if Congress had passed the bill which I presented years ago, the substance of which passed the Senate and which this House refused to consider.

I described to the House at the last session the use to which these dams would be put. The cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis and the State of Minnesota through a public corporation will be mighty glad to take this work off the hands of the United States and pay 3 per cent on this additional cost, so that the money will be all paid back into the United States Treasury. This can be arranged as soon as Congress will give us the chance. It is not our fault it has not been already provided. It is the fault of Congress, that this has not already been provided for. In this way we furnish practically this dam free of cost to the Government. This improvement takes care of millions of people. It will upbuild that great central territory. It will develop new means of competition. It will aid in the development of one of the most prosperous portions of the country, and the committee is to be congratulated on the provisions they have made for this great improvement in this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I want to congratulate my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] for the able statement which he has made at this juncture of the proceedings. He has had more to do with the development of the upper Mississippi than any other man in Congress to-day. I am only a novice, as is my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. [Applause.] I ask no credit for what has been done, and I want to give credit to this Committee on Rivers and Harbors and to my colleague, who has worked for 18 years for the advancement and building up of our river transportation on the upper Mississippi River. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Wisconsin states that there is no tonnage on the river between Minneapolis and St. Paul and wishes the committee to therefore conclude that it is a useless and extravagant waste of funds to make an appropriation for the completion of the project between the Twin Cities. His statement is grossly misleading. However, I am quite confident the gentleman did not intend it to be so.

Col. Charles M. Porter, the engineer in charge of this district, in a report made to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, 1913, said:

> Speaking of this stretch of the river, there is no navigation other than logs, and there will not be any until improvements in the river are completed.

Navigation will follow improvement, not improvement navigation. A fair test is not the present tonnage but, What are the prospects of developing a reasonable tonnage after improvements are in? This is especially true where the river is not navigable at all, as in the present case. The section of the river under discussion extends from the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway bridge in St. Paul to the Washington Avenue Bridge in Minneapolis, a distance of nearly 12 miles. The rapids and the velocity of the stream are such as to prevent navigation until, as Col. Porter says, the improvements are completed.

In the light of these additional facts, the fact that there is no commerce on this stretch of the river does not appear to be very material, but standing alone and unexplained might readily lead to a wrong conclusion. Likewise the construction attempted to be placed by my colleague on the statement that "construction of the lock and dam may develop passenger traffic between Minneapolis and St. Paul, and it is expected to reduce the freight rates on flour and grain from Minneapolis," in the report of the Chief of Engineers, is, to say the least, facetious. The gentleman from Wisconsin knows, or ought to know, as everybody else knows who is at all familiar with the local conditions at the Twin Cities, that the passenger traffic referred to in the report of the Chief of Engineers is such as will develop in connection with the passenger traffic that now exists between St. Paul and St. Louis, which is considerable. This will be increased as soon as it can be extended to Minneapolis. It was the extension of this general traffic and not the local traffic between St. Paul and Minneapolis that the engineer referred to.

It is evident from the foregoing that the reasons the gentleman assigns for objecting to the $235,000 item for completion of the lock and dam between the Twin Cities are not well founded. Moreover, they show that he is hard pressed for something substantial to sustain his position, else he would not resort to the ridiculous.

Again, the gentleman from Wisconsin says, in speaking of the appropriation of $1,200,000 for improving the river from St. Louis to Minneapolis, a distance of 668 miles, that the people of the whole country will be greatly benefited, even if this item is reduced only one-half, and that Members of Congress will be applauded for taking such action. If this be so, then by striking out the whole item the Members of this House should be proclaimed in glaring headlines as the patriots of the twentieth century, the saviors of the national credit, the exterminators of the "pork barrel" from our body politic. But by taking the position that no appropriation should be made for the improvement of this stretch of the river the gentleman places himself in opposition to the improvement of any of our inland waterways.

We are not at all surprised at the position taken by the gentleman, for we know there exists an organized opposition to the development of our inland waterways by a school of economists who contend that the present and prospective needs of commerce and industry can best be met by the further extension and development of railways, and that the expenditure of money upon waterways is therefore unwise and unnecessary, and that the demands of supplying the necessary transportation should be left entirely to the railways.

It is a well-known fact that managers of railways, as a general rule, are and have been hostile to waterways, and have resorted to various practices and schemes to destroy water traffic, and have been successful in many instances. Therefore it is quite as easy to get the public to believe that those opposing waterway improvements are in league with the railways as it is to convince them that those that believe in and favor the improvement of inland waterways are seeking to secure for themselves political advantage. However, the people who are vitally concerned in this question, since they will reap the profits if water transportation is a good thing or will have to pay the losses if it is not, are not interested in personal accusations, but want to know what the facts are, so that they may decide for themselves whether or not it is advisable to abandon water transportation to the railways. The people of the Central West, and particularly those of the Twin Cities, are deeply interested in the improvement of the Mississippi River, and more especially that portion of it known as the upper Mississippi.

HISTORY OF LEGISLATION.

Permanent and systematic work was begun on this portion of the river in 1878. At that time the condition of the channel was such that at low-water stages large boats were able to proceed upstream no farther than La Crosse or Winona, and it often occurred that they were unable to get upstream even that far, while now, due to the work that the Government has done since the adoption of the original project, the condition of the channel from St. Louis to St. Paul is such as to permit the passage of very large river boats at low-water stages to St. Paul. The original project proposed the making of a channel from St. Louis to St. Paul of a depth of 4½ feet at low water, to be eventually increased to 6 feet. In 1894 a separate project was adopted for the Mississippi River between St. Paul and Minneapolis. It provided for two locks and two dams—No. 1, just above the Minnehaha Creek, and the other, No. 2, 2.18 miles below the Washington Avenue Bridge, in Minneapolis—each lock to be 80 by 304 feet, and the depth of the lower miter sills to be 5 feet at low water. Congress in 1907, for the purpose of securing a channel of 6 feet deep on the upper Mississippi, adopted the report of the Chief of Engineers, which, in all essential features except the proposed deepening of the channel, was the same as the 1897 report, and fixed the upper limits of the 6-foot channel at Minneapolis. The Chief of Engineers, pursuant to a request made by Congress to cause an estimate to be made of the cost of securing a channel 6 feet deep in that portion of the river between the mouth of the Missouri River and St. Paul, placed the cost at $20,000,000, to be completed in 10 years. The change in the depth of the channel necessitated an increase in the lift of the two locks and an increase in the depth of the lower miter sills of Lock No. 1 to 6 feet at low water in the project between Minneapolis and St. Paul. This project was further modified in 1910, in accordance with the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers, based on the report of special board of officers of the Corps of Engineers, who had made a personal examination and a comprehensive report on the Mississippi River from St. Paul to Minneapolis, with a view to modification of the project to provide for the increased depth of the channel from 5 to 6 feet, as per the 1907 report, and the utilization of the surplus water for development of power.

In his recommendations to Congress the Chief of Engineers said that a single dam with a lift of approximately 30 feet would have many advantages over the present system of two locks and dams. It would give a depth of 9 feet at the head of navigation at Minneapolis, which would probably meet the needs of all future navigation; it would be easier and cheaper to maintain and operate, would provide better facilities for the passage of vessels, and would create a valuable water power, which could be utilized to pay the cost of construction as well as future maintenance and operation and produce a perpetual surplus revenue for the Government, and at no time in the future could such a change be accomplished so economically. And the additional expense could be recovered in a short time from the utilization of the water power which would be incidentally created by the proposed change in the project. "Moreover the creation of water power at this locality would be of special advantage to the governmental interests other than those of navigation; that the water power resulting from the plan proposed could be applied to meet the additional expense either directly, by means of a Government plant, or indirectly through leases to municipal or private corporations, and aside from the question of an improved navigation there would seem to be no doubt of the wisdom" of making a change from the two-dam project to the single-dam project. The Chief of Engineers further recommended that since the cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis are deeply interested in the construction of a high lock and dam and naturally would be the most desirable lessees of the surplus power that might be created thereby, negotiations be had with the proper agencies of these municipalities with a view to securing free of cost the flowage rights owned by the cities and entering into a suitable lease with them for the water power thus to be created.

Great changes had taken place since the adoption of the original plans for improvement of this section of the river. The agricultural and industrial production of the surrounding country had increased far beyond the expectation of anyone, and the ability to use water power several hundred miles from the dam, through the discovery of electrical transmission and the consequent increase in the value of water power, both combined, convinced Congress of the advisability of providing better navigation facilities and at the same time of developing water power. Besides, the citizens of both Minneapolis and St. Paul urged upon Congress the wisdom of making a change in the plans of the project so as to meet new conditions.

Satisfied in the end that it would be to the interests of the Government, Congress adopted the one-dam project, which is expected to be completed this fall. In the new scheme of development Lock and Dam No. 2 became unnecessary and has been abandoned.

Some criticism has been leveled at the officials having to do with this project for the loss of the money invested in Lock No. 2. However, I am confident that if the parties who are disposed to criticize will familiarize themselves with the history of this project they will come to the conclusion, as I have, that there is no just ground for criticism.

When this project was started, in 1894, water power had been nearly supplanted by steam, and was of little value. Cheap fuel was abundant. The transmission of electric energy had not been discovered. The volume of commerce was small, and there was no indication that it would increase rapidly. Who can say, in the light of these facts, that the originators of this great contribution to navigation should have combined with that enterprise the development of water power, and because of their neglect to do so should now be condemned? If this be the attitude we are going to assume toward public-spirited officials, why not heap derision upon the heads of the founders of St. Paul for their failure to anitcipate the future growth of that city, making it necessary at this time to expend millions of dollars in widening the streets, so as to take care of the ever-increasing traffic of that magnificent city. Even here at the very door of the National Capitol millions are being spent by the Government in the purchase back at high prices of property given away or sold at a nominal price by the Government in its early history. These and many similar instances go to substantiate the proposition that no constructive work has been carried on without some loss, and no man or set of men, however wise and honest they may be, can anticipate what the future may bring, and this is especially true in this age of invention, discovery, development, and rapid progress along all lines of human activity.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

In almost all cases this work is carried on by hired labor under the immediate supervision and direction of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army. These engineers are especially well qualified to prosecute work of this character. They are trained to take charge of this class of work by four years of mathematical, mechanical, and civil engineering study at our Military Academy at West Point, a year of inspection of the best type of river and harbor construction and other field practice, another year or two of special study of explosives, electricity, and civil engineering specialties. Besides, these men hold life positions, which makes them free from local bias and local interests. They have no interest to serve save that of the Government. This system of handling the river and harbor work has been in vogue since 1824. The wisdom of placing the same under the Army engineers has long since been demonstrated, and I believe there is no complaint on the score that the work of this trained body of experts has not been of a high character and generally satisfactory. It will be remembered that Col. Goethals, the builder of the Panama Canal, is a member of this corps.

THE COORDINATION OF RIVER AND RAIL TRANSPORTATION.

Inland waterways are a mere link in our transportation system. Their improvement, where the physical conditions make it feasible, is necessary, even though the cost seems high in some instances. Of course, there are many streams that should not be improved, because the cost would be out of all proportion to the benefits to be derived, but in the majority of cases this fact can be readily ascertained. Therefore all river improvements should not be condemned because some projects have no prospect of ever becoming commercially profitable. It may be possible at a slight expense to improve the channel of a river so as to convey large boats, but if it has no present or prospective tonnage along its course it would be very unwise to improve it even at a slight cost. On the other hand, the improvement of a certain river or the construction of a canal may be quite expensive, still it would be good business to make the improvement if tonnage, either present or prospective, that it will secure or affect is of sufficient value to yield a fair return, either directly or indirectly, on the investment. The Mississippi River, as well as a great number of other rivers of this country, is in this latter class. There are several substantial reasons why it is wise to improve such rivers. First and foremost, traffic can be carried by water much cheaper than by rail; secondly, by the direct saving through the reduction of railway rates due to the competition of water routes.

While it is true that water rates are lower than rail rates, the amount of this difference largely depends upon whether it is by canal, river, lake, or ocean, and the physical characteristics of the waterways employed and the number and size of vessels that can be used thereon. In the Great Lakes traffic this difference is so great on some commodities as to make it impossible for the railways to compete. This condition also applies to coastwise traffic, and under some conditions it applies to inland river commerce, which varies according to the length of the navigable route, depth of channel, wharfage facilities, and so forth. For instance, coal and lumber are carried on the river route from Pittsburgh to New Orleans by way of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers at a cost of $2 per ton, or less than 1 mill per ton-mile. Moreover, it is claimed that the actual cost does not exceed $1 per ton, or less than one-half mill per ton-mile. The cost by rail for this same service is from 7 to 8 mills per ton mile.

As soon as Lock and Dam No. 1 are completed similar routes can be established from Pittsburgh to the Twin Cities by way of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers; from Peoria, Ill., to the Twin Cities by way of the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers; from Riverton, Ala., to the Twin Cities by way of the Tennessee and Mississippi Rivers; from Nashville, Tenn., to the Twin Cities by way of the Cumberland and Mississippi Rivers; from Omaha and Kansas City to the Twin Cities by way of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers; and from New Orleans and St. Louis to the Twin Cities by way of the Mississippi River. Also, all coast towns would be accessible to the Twin Cities by way of the Panama Canal and the Mississippi River.

My colleague [Mr. STEVENS], who is an authority on transportation, contends that—

> By the use of modern barges and the erection of suitable terminals traffic can be handled on the upper Mississippi for about 1½ mills per ton-mile and not to exceed 4 mills per ton-mile. The average rail rate in this valley is 7.8 to 8 mills per ton-mile.

Even with the present antiquated transportation equipment and facilities the water rates between St. Louis and St. Paul are only about 66 per cent of the rail rates.

The fact that the river is prepared to carry tonnage will have a wholesome effect on freight rates, not only at river points but for several hundred miles on either side of the river, as is shown by the report of the Chief of Engineers:

> It is well known that wherever water transportation exists, whether by river, canal, or lake, its effect on freight rates is always beneficial to the public, and so long as navigation of the Mississippi River is feasible, and largely in proportion to its feasibility, such benefits will accrue, even if but little river commerce is actually carried on.

Further proof of this statement is evidenced by the commercial and industrial growth of sections of our country that are situated not on a river but in such relation to it that their produce and manufacture have had convenient and ready access to river transportation. Hence, not only Minneapolis and St. Paul and other river towns will be benefited, but South and North Dakota, Iowa, Montana, Wisconsin, Illinois, and the whole of Minnesota will derive a direct benefit from river traffic on the upper Mississippi.

The future agricultural and industrial growth of this splendid section of the United States depends now more than ever before upon its ability to float its commerce on the Mississippi and its tributaries, for the reason that the favored conditions which these North Central States have heretofore enjoyed in the way of nondiscriminatory rail rates are about to be destroyed by a readjustment of those rates to meet, it is alleged, the new condition created by the opening of the Panama Canal. Since the opening of the canal freight rates have been reduced 35 to 60 per cent by ocean carrying companies. Transcontinental railroads claim they can not meet these rates. It has been determined that 93 per cent of competitive freight from coast to coast points could be carried by water; hence the bulk of that competitive freight may be produced at the seaboard and shipped by way of the Panama Canal to the Pacific coast, and there sent eastward to compete with goods from Mississippi River and other Central West points, because these goods, on account of the combined water and rail rates, can be laid down in those localities cheaper than goods shipped from central interior points. By reason of the advantage given to coast towns by water transportation, the distributing territory of our Central West cities will be greatly decreased and the sales territory of the coast towns will be in like proportion increased. Therefore, in place of the Central West furnishing 75 per cent of the merchandise, as at present, for the territory between the Mississippi River and the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coast furnishing only 25 per cent, the Atlantic coast will furnish the 75 per cent and the Central West but 25 per cent. The loss of this competitive traffic to the Central West will be tremendous, and this loss can be retrieved only in one way, and that is by putting the Mississippi River in shape to give this section of the country water transportation.

WHY TRAFFIC ON WATERWAYS HAS DECLINED.

The opponents of inland waterways improvements contend that these once great highways of commerce are no longer possible or necessary transportation agencies and, as proof of their contention, point to a decline of navigation on them. While we must admit that there has been a decline of traffic on waterways we believe there is a satisfactory explanation for it. The Inland Waterway Commission found that railway interests, in a great many instances, conducted a successful campaign against waterway traffic by control of waterway fronts and terminals, purchase of competing vessels, discriminating tariffs, adverse placement of tracks and structures, and other unneutral acts and practices. A campaign waged along the foregoing line, together with legitimate competition, caused a decline in river traffic. While water traffic is confined to the channel, railways extend their operations over large territories, and thus can readily make up in receipts for reductions made at river points. The lack of properly constructed boats and modern terminals, such as the terminal at St. Louis with its up-to-date loading and unloading devices, and the one now being constructed at Minneapolis, which will contain every device and accommodation known to engineering skill for the economic handling of freight, handicaps river traffic as much as the opposition from the railroads, if not more. The Government, through a board of engineers created for the purpose of investigating the subject of river barges and terminals, has designed and is constructing an experimental barge of a type especially designed to take care of river traffic economically and safely, and municipally owned modern terminals are either being constructed or planned for in all important towns along the Mississippi River. European countries have had wonderful success in developing inland waterway transportation in connection with their railway systems, and their success is due in a large part to a recognition of the fact that up-to-date public terminals and harbors must be maintained. In some instances the amount expended for river and harbor facilities exceeds the amount expended on the channel itself. The expenditure of the different States along the Rhine for this purpose amounts to nearly $25,000,000.

Fortunately, all the difficulties in the way of developing river traffic, as heretofore pointed out, can be overcome. Railway rates and service are now subject to public control. The roads can be compelled, under existing laws, to make physical connections with water terminals, make through bills of lading, and to prorate charges with water transportation companies. Furthermore, under section 4 of the interstate commerce act, a railroad in competition with a water route is prohibited under certain conditions from reducing its rates to and from competitive points.

While waterways will continue to act as competitors and regulators of railroads in the most part, they will furnish greatly needed additional transportation facilities, in cooperation with those furnished by the great and extensive railway systems. The railroads recognize that in order to properly handle the rapidly increasing traffic of the country the present transportation facilities must be largely increased, but they claim they are powerless to meet this almost imperative demand unless they are permitted to materially increase railroad rates. In the eastern railway district the roads have been permitted to increase their rates 5 per cent, and petitions are now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission asking for increased rates in other districts. Thus it is plainly seen that the public must foot the bills for increased railway facilities. Therefore would it not be good business to divide this contribution between the railways and waterways, and especially since waterways are natural highways and can in the majority of cases be put in condition to carry freight for less money than it takes to build a railway and construct necessary additional terminals.

If bulky traffic could be restored to the waterways "where it economically belongs," so aptly stated by the Inland Waterways Commission, "and leave the railway equipment available for traffic properly moving by land, at the same time making possible a reduction of the other rail rates by cutting off business done at a loss and by increasing the volume of profitable business on the railroads," the same amount of traffic could be carried with a much smaller original investment of capital, which would redound to the advantage of the public and at the same time would enable the railroads to more efficiently handle traffic peculiarly adapted to that form of transportation.

There is no doubt but what an advantageous reciprocal relation could be established between railroads and waterways if all parties, including the Government, would come together in the spirit of mutual help and assistance. At least the demand that something be done to cheapen, and not increase, present traffic rates is so great that the parties concerned should make an honest effort to so reconcile any past differences they may have had and cooperate wherever cooperation is possible.

TONNAGE PROSPECTS.

It is pointed out by those who do not favor making further improvements in the upper Mississippi that there is not sufficient tonnage either present or prospective, to warrant the outlay. As soon as river improvements on this section of the river are completed water traffic will for the first time be accessible to the traffic of Minneapolis, and, through Minneapolis and St. Paul combined, to that wonderfully productive and growing territory comprising the States of Minnesota, South and North Dakota, Montana, northern Nebraska, northern Iowa, and western Wisconsin, as well as the rapidly expanding Canadian Northwest.

No other section of our country of like size can match the upper Mississippi Valley in variety and extent of natural resources or surpass its people in thrift, enterprise, stamina, and nobility of character. Within a generation, assisted by the blessing of Divine Providence, they have transformed a wilderness and a plain into magnificent fields and pastures and settled it with happy, vigorous, and prosperous citizens, and developed a commerce capable in the beginning of being carried in the pack sack or oxcart to one that now requires 9 railway systems representing 48,591 miles of track connecting 8,065 communities by bands of steel with the Twin City, the metropolis of the Northwest. The valuation of these roads within the bounds of only three States was as follows:

South Dakota (1908)	$106,494,502
Minnesota (1907)	360,961,548
Wisconsin (1909)	296,803,322

Making a total valuation in these three States in 1907, 1908, and 1909 of $764,259,372.

In 1912 the States of Minnesota, South and North Dakota, and Montana produced an aggregate of 928,000,000 bushels of grain and potatoes and 4,618,000 tons of hay, having an aggregate value of $455,000,000; dairy products, $75,000,000; live stock, $110,000,000; poultry and eggs, $25,000,000; and minerals, $150,000,000, making a grand total of annual production from the farm and mine in these three States in 1912 of $815,000,000. It is safe to say that Nebraska, Iowa, and Wisconsin's production of farm products was as great, if not greater, than the States named. The Twin Cities are the natural centers for all the agricultural and commercial interests of this great producing section, and by having combined rail and water transportation facilities at their door they can serve the people of this section better than they have been able to do heretofore by affording them cheaper transportation to the markets of the world. As a result of the strategical position of the Twin Cities they have grown by leaps and bounds and are destined to hold their position as the great marketing center of this rapidly expanding section of the United States; their combined population of about 600,000 is increasing rapidly; their commercial growth has not been impeded even by the European war; the banking institutions of the Twin Cities in 1913 had a combined capital and surplus of $32,394,000 and deposits of $170,647,000. In 1898 the total deposits of all the banks in Minnesota and South and North Dakota were $78,192,000, while in 1913 the deposits of Minnesota alone were $379,013,000, and the total deposits for the three States in 1913 were $559,869,000. In 1909 the Twin Cities manufactured products of the value of $244,339,598; had engaged in manufacture 59,920 persons, and paid out for salaries, services, and wages $75,000,000. The freight traffic of Minneapolis-St. Paul in 1913 amounted to 1,174,367 cars.

Minneapolis citizens are entitled to special credit from the whole country for having done some big things. They have built up the largest manufacturing center in the world for flour and linseed oil, and have developed the largest spring wheat market in the world, the greatest lumber center in the United States, the greatest jobbing center in the Northwest, and the greatest agricultural implement distributing center in the Northwest.

Mr. Chairman, with such a prospect before us, can it be said that this rapidly growing section of our country could not furnish sufficient freight of at least a bulky class to warrant the investment necessary to complete the channel and harbor work of the upper Mississippi? We find a situation not only making it wise that this investment should be made, but which demands that it should be done. The railroads, it is true, have contributed a great deal toward the great agricultural, industrial, and commercial growth of this section of the country, but they are reaching the limit of their ability to continue without the investment of vast sums of money, and this central Northwest demands increased transportation facilities, and if traffic can be established on the Mississippi River it will lend a great stimulus to the further development of the almost inexhaustible natural resources of this section and to the activity of its millions of inhabitants.

Manufacturing is becoming one of the chief industries and requires the oak and the yellow pine from the South; mahogany, circassian walnut, and other important woods from all parts of the world; coal and iron from Pennsylvania; coal from Illinois; rubber, coconut, and other tropical products from Mexico and Central and South America. Also, coffee, tea, rice, and sugar are imported in great quantities to this section of the country, as well as to the Canadian northwest. These articles of commerce could be brought to us over the river, and for the return trip we could furnish flour, grain, livestock, building material, machinery, millstuff, structural iron, electric equipments, linseed oil, and oil cake. It is self-evident that unless the merchants and manufacturers of the Central West are able to obtain as favorable transportation rates as the seaboard towns their operations must be limited to a very narrow field; therefore, in order to bring about and maintain favorable rates, it is necessary to supplement our railway systems with a comprehensive system of waterways. Cheap transportation is one of the chief factors in building up and maintaining agriculture, industry, and commerce.

FALSE ECONOMY.

Mr. Chairman, those opposed to the pending river and harbor bill contend further that even though it may be wise to improve the inland waterways of the country this is not the time to do it, because the Treasury is depleted. If this question could be set apart, as it were, so as not to bear on any other social or economic question, the force of logic would support the contention of the opposition. However, the fact is that the question of whether or not river improvements shall be stopped because the Treasury receipts, on account of an unwise fiscal policy and the European war, are not equal to the normal expenses of the Government can not be separated from the commercial and industrial interests of the country and the welfare of the people employed in this class of work and their families and those with whom they trade. Public business and private business are so interwoven that the slackening of one, however slight, will immediately injuriously affect the other. When times are good and labor is well employed, men thrown out of work by the closing down of either a public or private plant soon find work in other plants, and the whole economic system goes on as before with little, if any, jar. But in times of industrial stress, like the present, when private plants are idle and the Government refuses to take on new projects these men will be thrown on the street and their families left to suffer in want, and financial ruin and bankruptcy will overtake their grocer and butcher.

If the very existence of the Government depended upon the stopping of necessary public improvements, then in a spirit of patriotism we would have to yield to the will of the Government for the Government's own protection and safety. Can it be said that the United States, with 100 millions of energetic, frugal, honest, and intelligent people, producing ten billions of new agricultural wealth each year and a commerce of thirty billions and having nearly $18,000,000,000 in banks and savings institutions has reached the point that, in order to save itself from bankruptcy, it must stop work on necessary public improvements?

I am satisfied that the gentleman who is the most active in his opposition to this bill after mature reflection will be one of the first to oppose such an asinine policy on the part of the Government. Bread lines have again been established in our large cities, and we should have a watchful care that no act of ours will have a tendency in any way to increase the number that are forced to depend on this obnoxious though apparently well-meant charity.

The prosperity and welfare of the whole people are as much the concern of the Government as it is to secure them in their person and their property. The Government proposes to spend $249,000,000 on the Army and Navy for the ensuing year, which is used for the purpose of protecting the person and property of its citizens, and if those who believe that no appropriation should be made for necessary public works or any improving, repairing, and caring for public property are to have their way, not a dollar will be spent for the welfare and happiness of the people, and as a result a great number of laborers will be thrown out of employment and partially finished public works and public buildings will be ruined by delay either in their completion or in neglect in their care and protection.

When public and private business is at a standstill is not the time to adopt a policy that will tend to increase stagnation, misery, and want, but, on the contrary, is the time for Representatives of the people to rise to the occasion and adopt such measures and such policies as will tend to relieve such unnecessary conditions. National, State, and municipal governments should continue to carry on necessary public improvements that employment may be furnished to those who depend solely upon their labor for their livelihood and that business men may be encouraged in the pursuit of their various enterprises, to the end that activity and not stagnation may be abroad in our land. This is no time for false prophets nor would-be economists, but the day demands courage and foresight of our public officials and recognition by the Government and those who are charged with conducting its affairs of the responsibility that the Government owes to its citizens not only in the protection of their property and persons, but in the securing to them of a right to earn an honest living, and not to throw them upon the cold charity of well-meaning citizens.

Gentlemen, let us not be afraid to assume our portion of the responsibility, even though there will be an attempt by the chronic critic to misinterpret it. I should feel like a hypocrite if I did not stand by this committee when I know it is right.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, on the argument of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], I desire to withdraw my amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Missouri River: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, with a view to securing a permanent 6-foot channel between Kansas City and the mouth of the river, $1,200,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to present the facts briefly. In order to anticipate whatever may be said in opposition regarding the commerce on this river, I desire to refer to page 2513 of the engineer's report, wherein it is stated that there were 347,235 tons of commerce in 1913. Of that amount 312,090 tons were sand and gravel hauled 1 mile. That is about nine-tenths of the commerce. Then there was cordwood, and there were building materials and other articles hauled 10 miles, making 323,249 tons out of the 347,235 tons, leaving a net balance of 23,986 tons. This is a $20,000,000 project. We have spent over $7,000,000 since it was undertaken, making $27,000,000. I do not intend to discuss the merits of it beyond reading a brief statement. This comes from a man who, in my judgment, knows more about this project possibly than anyone on the floor, unless it is those who live in the immediate vicinity. This is what he says:

The proponents of this monumental folly quote the general commerce carried on this river last year (referring to 1912) of 185,110 tons; and yet of this amount the official statistics show that 155,420 tons consisted of sand and gravel carried an average distance of 1 mile and worth less than 40 cents a ton. The engineers declare it will cost half a million dollars a year to maintain a channel on the Missouri from Kansas City to St. Louis, approximately the cost of maintaining the harbors of Boston, New York, Baltimore, Norfolk, and Charleston combined, with 5,000 tons to every single ton of actual commerce on the river.

I have been quoting from Senator BURTON'S statement some time ago. I only moved to strike out the last word, and I will let it go at that. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Missouri River: For improvement and maintenance from Kansas City to Sioux City, $75,000, of which amount at least $50,000 may be expended for such bank revetment as, in the judgment of the Chief of Engineers, may be in the interest of navigation; continuing improvement and for maintenance from Sioux City to Fort Benton, $75,000, of which amount at least $50,000 may be expended for such bank revetment as in the judgment of the Chief of Engineers may be in the interest of navigation; in all, $150,000.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, in line 12, after the word "navigation," insert:
"Provided, That $10,000 of said $50,000 shall be expended at or near Florence, Nebr., upon receipt of the Secretary of War of the sum of $10,000 from the Metropolitan water district of the city of Omaha, Nebr., the total sum of $20,000 to be expended at or near Florence, Nebr., as directed by the Secretary of War."

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state there has been an amount of work done by the Government in keeping the channel of the Missouri River in proper shape at Florence. Florence is a suburb of the city of Omaha. The city of Omaha owns its own water plant and has $8,000,000 invested in it. The pumping plant is at Florence. This water plant or water district supplies about 250,000 people, residents of Omaha and suburban towns, including Fort Omaha and the Federal buildings at Omaha. In keeping this channel in proper bounds it is absolutely necessary to protect the work that has been done heretofore and that about 2,000 feet of revetment work be continued and added to the present protection or work done.

Last year the Government expended at this point of the river about $5,000, and the Omaha city waterworks added to this sum $5,000, all of which except about $800 has been expended, and nearly 900 feet of revetment work was constructed and finished, but it is necessary to extend the work. Now, we ask that of the $50,000, which does not increase the appropriation in this bill, that the engineers be directed to use $10,000 of this money, namely, $50,000, to take care of the river banks at this point and keep the channel in its place, provided the city of Omaha through its water district shall put up $10,000 and thereby increase the sum to be expended to $20,000, which will approximately construct an additional 2,000 feet of revetment.

Every improvement that has been made near the city of Omaha along the banks of the Missouri River or by the corporations that have been interested in this protection work, the city or corporations have expended a dollar for every dollar the Government has expended; it has been a joint expenditure. This is not an increase of appropriation in this bill. My object in offering the amendment is so that the engineers shall be directed to do this work immediately, for the improvement is necessary.

Now, the good chairman of the committee [Mr. SPARKMAN] has told me that he would tell the engineers to do this, but he is a very busy man; he has to listen to all of our complaints and all of our suggestions, and I think at this time that the committee ought to accept this amendment and allow this improvement, and should direct the Government engineers to do the work. The city of Omaha through its water company is ready to place $10,000 at the Government's disposal for construction of this needed improvement.

I heard the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] a few minutes ago talk so interestingly about navigation, saying that St. Louis, Kansas City, and St. Paul and other cities on the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers were engaged in building municipal-owned docks for river navigation. We are interested in Omaha in the same way. Large meetings have been held by business men within the last month in the city of Omaha, and docks will be constructed and boats built for navigation on the Missouri River from Omaha to points up and down the river. Omaha's people are intensely interested. We handle 60,000,000 bushels of grain in Omaha annually and over 30,000,000 bushels go to the South and could be shipped by boat down the Missouri River and the Mississippi just as well as by railroads, and cheaper. I would respectfully ask the committee to accept this amendment, but if it does not I shall ask the House to accept the amendment.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will not grant the request of my friend from Nebraska. This provision written in the bill provides that the engineers may use out of this appropriation $50,000 for bank revetment. Now, this is bank revetment. The House should not tell the engineers where they should use it. The city of Kansas City, Kans., wants it to say that a part shall be used there. Atchison, Kans., wants a part used there and a place south of St. Joseph wants a part used there. Omaha wants a specific sum used there. If you are going to parcel it out Sioux City will not get anything, but it will all be parceled out in places where we do not know whether it ought to go or not.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. Do these cities offer to put up a sum equal in amount to the sum they want used?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes. The gentleman states that last year the water company gave $5,000 and the Government gave them $5,000.

Has he any right to say if the water company gives $10,000 this year the Government will not give them $10,000? The bill leaves it to the judgment of the engineers, and if they believe that work there is in the interest of navigation, they certainly will do this year as they did last year. The bill ought not to carry any such provision directing the engineers where it shall be expended. The engineers say that to put $10,000 there is simply for temporary purposes and will not be permanent work, and it ought not to be done. Here is what they say about it in a letter addressed to my friend. Gen. Kingman says:

The district officers report that the locality in question is one where, in the winter of 1913–14, 875 feet of revetment was constructed jointly by the United States and the metropolitan water district, the latter having contributed $5,000 for the purpose and the Government $5,000.

Bear in mind that it had $10,000 to construct 875 feet of revetment work. To continue:

Of the funds then made available there is a balance on hand at present of $880.04, which is being held for repairs or possible extension. With the further joint expenditure of $10,000 suggested by Mr. Howell, an additional 1,000 feet of revetment could be built.

It would take $20,000 to build 1,000 feet of revetment.

Mr. LOBECK. Oh, no; $20,000 will build 2,000 feet.

Mr. BOOHER. No. It says:

With a further joint expenditure of $10,000, as suggested by Mr. HOWELL, an additional thousand feet of revetment can be built—

And here is the point of this letter—

but it would afford only temporary protection, as it would probably be flanked by the river—

That is, cut out by the river—washed away.

Permanent protection would require extension of revetment from the present work to Boyer Creek, a distance of 16,000 feet. There are not sufficient funds on hand at the present time to undertake this work.

I want to call attention to the fact that the engineers have made no survey, have made no estimate of the cost of that improvement, and why direct this commission to put $10,000 of this $50,000 anywhere when it is to be only temporary—and that will be flanked by the river, cut out, unless you extend it 16,000 feet?

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman mean to imply that the $5,000 was wasted?

Mr. BOOHER. Oh, no. I mean to imply this—that it is not going to be a great while, I hope, until the Government improves the Missouri River as far west and north as Omaha, and they do not want to continue this other improvement until this one is done.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understand the Government has already expended $5,000 on this work.

Mr. BOOHER. Yes; and it is only temporary, and unless the balance of this is done——

Mr. MURDOCK. And has nothing to do with navigation?

Mr. BOOHER. Oh, yes; it does have to do with navigation. I believe revetment of the banks of these rivers has all to do with navigation, because you confine the river within its channel.

Mr. MURDOCK. Would not a further expenditure of $10,000 further navigation?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes; but the engineer says that will only be temporary. My objection to this whole thing is that this Congress ought not to direct the engineers where they should spend any part of this sum at any particular place, but should leave it to their judgment to expend it where it will do the most good to improve the navigation of the river, as this provision says. We have given them $50,000 for that, and why direct them?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman says it will take $20,000 for 1,000 feet. It is a matter of record by that letter that about ninety-two hundred dollars put up a solid revetment for 1,000 feet last year, $5,000 of which the city of Omaha put up, and about forty-two hundred dollars of which was put up by the Government. They have $800 on hand. This amendment calls for $20,000 total—$10,000 from the city of Omaha and $10,000 from the Government—and it would construct 2,000 feet revetment, and it would also protect a large amount of territory that is covered by manufacturing plants in the north part of Omaha.

I will tell you what is the matter with you men down in Kansas City and St. Joseph. When we want any work done at Omaha we have to go on our knees to the engineers at Kansas City. I laid a map before the committee which showed how this work should be done, and which the engineers stated should be done for extension.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield for a question now?

Mr. LOBECK. We have got $8,000,000 worth of property to take care of. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Now, Gen. Kingman said that the $10,000 spent there built 875 feet of revetment. Now, where do you get the 2,000 feet?

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman stated $20,000 would only build 1,000 feet.

Mr. BOOHER. I say so now.

Mr. LOBECK. Not according to the letter. It would pay for construction of 2,000 feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Missouri project.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to any of these requests? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sacramento and Feather Rivers, Cal.: Continuing improvement in accordance with the recommendations of the California Débris Commission in its report dated June 30, 1907 (printed in the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, for 1907, pp. 2262 to 2269, inclusive), $140,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended until the State of California shall have appropriated and made available for the prosecution of said project a sum which, together with that heretofore furnished by said State, shall equal the total amount appropriated by the United States for said work.

[Mr. DONOVAN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That for examinations, surveys, and contingencies for rivers and harbors for which there may be no special appropriation, the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated: Provided, That no preliminary examination, survey, project, or estimate for new works other than those designated in this or some prior act or joint resolution shall be made: Provided further, That after the regular or formal reports made as required by law on any examination, survey, project, or work under way or proposed are submitted no supplemental or additional report or estimate shall be made unless ordered by a concurrent resolution of Congress: And provided further, That the Government shall not be deemed to have entered upon any project for the improvement of any waterway or harbor mentioned in this act until funds for the commencement of the proposed work shall have been actually appropriated by law.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 37, strike out all of the paragraph beginning with line 22, down to line 12, on page 38.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph provides for surveys on new projects and some existing old ones. I will state——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This is not the paragraph that provides for new projects. This is a paragraph placing limitations upon surveys.

Mr. FOSTER. It provides there shall not be more than $250,000 expended. I want to strike this out, and if this should prevail, which I very much doubt, then I shall follow it up by striking out all the paragraphs that follow.

Mr. MANN. That is all right. It is the next paragraph that provides for surveys, and it would be very unfortunate to strike out this paragraph and leave the others in, because this is a limitation.

Mr. FOSTER. I expect to take out the next one, too, if I can get it. This provides for the expending of not more than $250,000 for these surveys.

Now, I do not know whether the committee proposes to go ahead with a lot of these new surveys or not, when we already have authorized and appropriated for $250,000,000. There is also provided for surveys which have been approved by the board of engineers a little more than $100,000,000. So if these projects should be adopted, or any considerable number of them, it will make from $350,000,000 to $450,000,000 of obligations on the Government. And I submit, Mr. Chairman, that at a time like this, when we have authorized the improvement of every creek, river, and harbor throughout the land, we ought not to put on a lot of insignificant creeks and harbors from Maine to Alaska, as provided in this bill. And I, for one, believe in the proper improvement of the proper rivers and harbors of the country. But I tell you it is time that we should call a halt until we can catch up and pay for some of the things that we have already authorized in this bill and those that we have passed before. [Applause.]

So, if the motion should prevail to strike out this paragraph, I propose to carry it forward and strike out every item from this bill that provides for a new survey for other and further improvements. There are 172 surveys provided in this bill besides all those that have been authorized. No man lives today that can look back and see when some of these improvements first began that have not yet been completed. Let us complete them instead of taking on a lot of these insignificant streams that they want to put on the map and that no man on earth who lives in the particular community knows exists. So, Mr. Chairman, I believe it is good business to strike out these items. If it can be shown that there is some particular item on which it is necessary to make the survey, it should be made and the money provided for it; but to make this indiscriminate lot of surveys provided in this bill is a ridiculous thing, and it makes a river and harbor bill ridiculous before the country. And I for one want to strike them out and get rid of them, and complete the legitimate, honest, and fair projects that we have now under consideration and that we are appropriating for year after year. [Applause.]

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois show how a good man often makes a mistake when he does not know definitely what he is talking about.

Now, he wants to convey the impression that these projects for which we are going to make these surveys are all new projects, and he assumes that all of them are bad. Now, just let me give him one illustration of what the result would be as to one particular project if his motion prevailed and we had no surveys in this bill. There is one survey called for in the bill for the Lake Washington Canal. It will cost the Government perhaps not to exceed $50. I doubt if it will cost that much. All the necessary information is in the office of the engineer. He is ready to furnish it at any time, but unless you get that information and unless you have that survey that will cost the Government practically nothing, you will have a project that has cost over $6,000,000 practically useless. Now, certainly the gentleman does not want to do a thing of that kind.

Mr. FOSTER. If they already have the information, what is the use of this?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You can not do any new work without a survey and authorization according to law. Now, it so happens, and I will not undertake to say where the fault lies, that just below that great lock in that canal there has to be some excavation made before a large ship can get in that lock. The canal is practically completed. The lock will be finished in a few days, and we will have a great canal and a great commerce waiting for it, but there is a little work that has to be done down below, between that and deep water in Puget Sound before you can make use of it, and the engineer has money ready to expend. But you can not do anything until you get a survey.

Now, such contingency frequently arises. For instance, there may be a caving in of the work, so that it is necessary to do some revetment work and make some changes. Therefore you have to have a survey. I want to say this to the gentleman also in conclusion, that a great majority of these surveys are only preliminary, and the engineer goes to look at it, at practically no cost, and reports adversely on half of them in that way. And the expense is small. I think the members of this committee will agree with me that this is money well expended, where a community is insisting that its Member of Congress get river and harbor improvement. They send delegations after you. They are all the time working and insisting that an improvement be made. You get a survey, and two-thirds of the time, by the expenditure of a few dollars you get a survey, the engineer often makes an adverse report, and that ends the agitation. And I think from that standpoint alone it is well worth while, and I think it would be a mistake to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 95.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause preliminary examinations and surveys to be made at the following-named localities, and a sufficient sum to pay the cost thereof may be allotted from the amount provided in this section.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, strike out the paragraph between lines 13 and 17.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, this is the paragraph that authorizes the survey of all these little creeks and rivulets throughout the country, and I dare say that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and its membership, with all the wisdom that they have and with the many years' service that they have had upon that great committee, would not be able to tell, if they would go to the communities where many of these little streams are located, what many of them were.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] a little while ago talked about the survey that was to be made of a canal connecting two lakes with the Sound in his particular State, close to Seattle, and it was impossible, he said, unless this survey was made or unless the authorization was made here in this particular item, to open that canal. I hope that the business of the Government is not in such condition at this time and that the laws are not such that the hands of Congress are tied so that they are unable to get a little survey that costs $50 without authorizing in this bill a lot of these projects that are worthless and of no account and that ought not to be in the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are some worthy projects in these surveys that are proposed to be authorized by this legislation, but I dare say that 95 per cent of them will never prove worth anything to the commerce of the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. How are we to ascertain whether or not they are worthy projects if we do not get a report on them?

Mr. FOSTER. I take it that the gentleman, who has served so long and ably on that committee, would not find it necessary to go through all this program before he would be able to discover that surveys should be made of these little creeks throughout the country at Government expense. I notice that one of these surveys proposed to be made is of Mud Creek, Butler County, Ky. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. I would like to ask the gentleman what he knows of Mud Creek?

Mr. FOSTER. I see the name is here in the bill, and I suppose the item is for aid to navigation.

Mr. THOMAS. That is all I expect you know about any of these things. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. That may be true, but I dare say Mud Creek will never be made navigable, even if you were to spend money on it for 100 years. I do not pick out that item invidiously any more than any other of the 100 items of the same kind in the bill; but this particular item, it seems, had to be designated and described by the county where it happened to be located. I suppose that Mud Creek could not be located unless it was stated to be in Butler County, Ky. I am not finding fault with any particular one of these items, but I am finding fault with a lot of these surveys that we are proposing to authorize in this bill that ought not to be here. This item is no different possibly from a hundred others, and it may be better than some; and I think, Mr. Chairman, we ought to strike from this bill these items that will never amount to anything and thus get rid of them. [Applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, it is true that Mud Creek, in Butler County, Ky., is in this bill by name. I presume the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is not very much acquainted with geography, and I wanted to make it plain just where this creek is situated. It is not the purpose of this survey of Mud Creek to make that creek navigable. Mud Creek empties into Green River, which is a navigable stream, and the deepest stream in the world, according to its width. [Laughter.] Large steamboats navigate that stream all the year round.

In 1832 the State of Kentucky locked and dammed that river. [Laughter.] In 1886 that river was ceded to the Government. After that cession a few years back the Government repaired those locks and dams and added to the height of them. The result of that was that the water above the lock and dam at Rochester backed up to such an extent into the creeks that empty into Green River as to nearly ruin the farming lands along those creeks. And Mud Creek is one of these streams where the farming lands along it are practically ruined because this dam was made higher. Now, the purpose of this survey is not to make this stream navigable, for that would be impossible, even for Illinois steamboats, and they are the smallest in the world. [Laughter.] But the object of it is to see if some means can be found to lower that dam at Rochester and put a movable cap upon it, so that the backwater will not back up those streams and ruin the farming lands. That is the object of it, and not to make the stream navigable. [Applause.]

I do not know whether that can be done or not, but I want this survey authorized to see what the Government engineers think about it; and that is the reason this survey is authorized in this bill. And I presume if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] would examine into the real reasons for these other surveys, by asking the Members of this House who have had these surveys put in this bill, he would be enlightened to a much greater extent upon this subject than he now seems to be. [Applause.] He has simply shot at random in the dark, and if he has missed the mark all along as he has in regard to Mud Creek, he has missed it in every one of them. It shows, Mr. Chairman, that a man ought to know what he is talking about in this House before he begins to talk. [Laughter.] He ought to get the proper information upon these subjects.

I do not know anything about the reasons for any of these other surveys in the bill, but I take it that the Members who have had them placed in this bill could, if that were possible, enlighten the gentleman from Illinois upon these subjects; and I hope, Mr. Chairman, that these projects will all be kept in this bill, including Mud Creek, in Butler County, Ky. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I hope this motion will not prevail. I should like to state some reasons. My friend from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has spoken of these "insignificant" and "worthless" new projects that have been put on. All the surveys are not to locate new projects that exist in the country. They are frequently for the amplification and enlargement of important projects. For instance, one of the surveys is for New York Harbor, which carried last year $2,000,000,000 of commerce. There is an improvement desired there. I submit that it is worth while to have the engineers examine into it.

Another item for which a survey is provided is for the Hudson River Channel, which last year floated a commerce of nearly $3,000,000,000. Another is for Buffalo Harbor, which last year floated a commerce of $416,000,000. Another is for the channel at Baltimore, which last year floated a commerce of $439,000,000. Another is for the harbor of Savannah, Ga., which last year floated a commerce of $360,000,000, and another is for Duluth-Superior Harbor, which last year floated a commerce of $352,000,000.

Now, if this tremendous commerce that is already developed in these various harbors throughout the country—and I have just taken them in different parts of the bill—is worth while, if it is desirable to have a greater depth, or a wider channel, or a turning basin, or some other amplification of the facilities that are now furnished, certainly it is worth the while of this Congress to have the engineers of the Government go and visit these harbors and make an examination and report back to us, and then we can pass judgment on them.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] has spoken of Mud Creek, and I have endeavored to give just a few instances of the great projects that are involved in this section. I hope this House will not do the unwise thing of striking out all of these investigations. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FOSTER)—there were 48 ayes and 110 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sebethe River, Conn., from its mouth to a point at or near the city of Bristol, Conn., and canal from a suitable point on the Sebethe River to New Britain, Conn.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 40, after line 16, insert:

"Housatonic River, Conn.: To head of navigation with a view of securing a channel 20 feet deep."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Buffalo Harbor, N. Y., with a view to securing a width of 400 feet in the inner harbor entrance channel, including consideration of any proposition for cooperation on the part of local interests.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice there are 172 projects to be surveyed, and in 10 instances provision is made to include propositions for cooperation on the part of local interests. That means that in 162 cases the Government is to pay for the improvement if the project is approved, and in the remaining 10 instances the local interests are expected to cooperate in the matter of expense. If it is to be the policy of the Rivers and Harbors Committee to require localities to participate in the expense of some projects only, we ought to know it, in order to provide for the future. Take this item of the Buffalo Harbor, N. Y.; are they to bear a portion of the expense of the project merely because they have the means to pay? How are we to determine which community shall sustain the expense and which shall not?

I raise the question now, in the hope that some member of the committee will explain whether it is to be the policy of the committee hereafter to require local interests to contribute to the expense of the improvement when surveys are granted.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I will say in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the fact that it is not required here is not conclusive that it may not be required before we make the improvement. The committee takes into consideration the particular surroundings and circumstances in each case. I have been one of those who insisted in a great many cases in cooperation, but in some places it can not be done.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Chairman, I will state in this particular case the Lackawanna Railroad Co. expects to pay a part of this improvement and the city of Buffalo may also join in paying the expenses, so that in this instance it is entirely proper to have the provision in.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from New York is familiar with this and says it is satisfactory to his people. I call attention to the fact that a survey is granted for New York Harbor just above, with a view of removing Craven Shoals, and no cooperation on the part of local interests is asked. All through the bill it is the same way. There are only 10 cases in which cooperation is required.

As to Buffalo, however, the gentleman informs us, there is a mutual understanding with the people, and part payment is to be made by a railroad.

Mr. SMITH of New York. It was entirely agreeable to us.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Shrewsbury River, N. J., with a view to constructing works to prevent the sea from breaking through and destroying the navigable channel, including consideration of any proposition for cooperation on the part of local or State interests.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, here is another case in point, and I shall ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] if he will explain why the condition is put in here that the local interests shall contribute to the expense? Why is it provided that consideration shall also be given to any proposition of cooperation on the part of the local or State interests? Why is that made necessary when it is not required in so many other cases? Before the gentleman answers I will say this: There have been very heavy storms along the New Jersey coast, and not very far from where this improvement is contemplated there has been great damage. Property has been destroyed and the value of land has been affected. As a matter of fact, the flood conditions are relatively the same as they are on the interior, where relief appropriations are made. Why, when no condition for participation in the expense by the local interests is made in other cases, is it made in respect to the Shrewsbury River?

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, because the gentleman interested thought that perhaps the local authorities would want to participate. That is all. He thought that was the best way to make the survey.

Mr. MOORE. That was the best way to induce the committee to accept the project?

Mr. BURGESS. No; not that. There was no disposition on the part of anybody on the committee to force contributions from any community. It never has been done.

Mr. MOORE. To save time I am going to ask the gentleman now, because I shall do it when we come to it if he does not answer now, why the same condition is imposed in respect to the Delaware River on the item succeeding this one, which is as follows:

Delaware River, from mouth of Cooper River to Fishers Point Dike on the New Jersey shore, including consideration of any proposition for cooperation on the part of local interests.

The city of Camden has made large contributions for the improvement of the water front, and it ought to have a deeper channel, but why before the survey is granted is the condition imposed that the local interests shall also make arrangement with engineers for joint expense. Why is it done in this case when it is not done in so many other cases?

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is mistaken. There is no disposition on the part of the committee to force contribution, but to consider any proposition that may be made by the locality. If the gentleman will read the language he will see that.

Mr. MOORE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it is not intended as conclusive at all?

Mr. BURGESS. Oh, no.

Mr. MOORE. Merely a suggestion that the community can contribute if it desires to?

Mr. BURGESS. That is all.

Mr. MOORE. And it is without prejudice?

Mr. BURGESS. That is true.

The Clerk read as follows:

Smith Creek, Md.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 43, by inserting after line 11 the following:
"Nanjemoy Creek, Md."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Little Wicomico River, Va.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 43, by inserting after line 18 the following:
"From small boat harbor at Newport News, Va., to York River, with a view to connecting by canals Newmarket Creek, Back River, and Poquoson River with York River, in order to provide a safe inland passage for small boats between Newport News and York River."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Savannah River at Augusta, Ga., with a view to determining what improvements are necessary in the interests of navigation between the upper line of the city limits of the city of Augusta and the mouth of Butlers Creek, by way of enlarging and extending the project authorized by the river and harbor acts approved June 25, 1910, and March 4, 1913.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out lines 22, 23, 24, and 25 on page 44, and by striking out lines 1, 2, 3, and 4 on page 45 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:
"Savannah River at Augusta, Ga., between the upper lines of the city limits of the city of Augusta and the mouth of Butlers Creek, for the purpose of ascertaining the effect upon navigation of the river of the flood-protection work now being constructed and maintained by local authorities, and to further ascertain the probable cost and value of the extension of such work over such territory."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I am informed that but once in the history of the River and Harbor Committee has its bill been amended upon the floor of the House. This therefore causes me to come to one or two conclusions. Is there a tentative agreement among the Members whose districts are affected by this bill to vote down all amendments; or has the committee made such a careful investigation and so exhaustive a study of all the hearings had before it as to cause Members of the House to conclude that the amendments are lacking in merit or else they would have been incorporated in the report of the committee?

Charity and justice to the membership of this committee, among whom are some of my warmest friends, cause me to conclude the latter. But I sincerely trust that this committee and the House will not harden their hearts on this amendment.

I am fully convinced that it is most difficult for me to have the amendment ingrafted on this bill, but that fact, Mr. Chairman, does not deter me from the effort; for I well know that it is the true soldier who fights when he knows his battalions are weak. Any soldier can fight when he knows his battalions are strong. Believing as I do, my voice shall always be heard in behalf of the people of my district when their interests are affected. I present this amendment with all the force of my being to the membership of the House for their consideration, for in my opinion it is just and right and should be adopted.

The object of this amendment is to order a survey for the purpose of ascertaining between given points the effect upon navigation on the river of the flood-protection work which is now underway, and to ascertain the probable cost and value of the extension of such work on said territory. I well know that objection will be raised to the verbiage of this amendment. It will be contended that the committee does not think that the protection of private property against floods is one of its prerogatives, and that this amendment goes beyond the function of the committee. For this reason they will seek to urge the House to defeat the same, as the proposed amendment calls for a survey, not only of the navigation of the river but also for an estimation of the value and the cost of the construction of levees along certain points of this river to protect the city of Augusta from disastrous floods.

I am seeking to have this amendment adopted, because it will do for the citizens who live in that locality the same thing that the Government has repeatedly heretofore done, and spent millions upon millions of dollars on this kind of work for the citizens who live along the Mississippi. Some Member may rise and say that the authority to spend millions of dollars on this work for the Mississippi River has the approval of the Baltimore platform, which contained a plank on that subject.

In reply to such a criticism, I want to know where is a Member of this House who will contend that because the Mississippi River was mentioned in the Baltimore platform, in view of the fact that a great national calamity had occurred there, and the attention of the whole country and the party was directed to it, that it prohibited humanitarian work of similar character from being done in other portions, and that the Congress would disapprove of it, because no reference was made as to other such calamities in other portions of the country.

It may be that the interests of my constituents at home has made me partial to their cause, but when it is boiled down to its last analysis I can not see any way but that you have built the levees and maintained them upon the Mississippi River, and spent millions and millions of dollars to accomplish the same; and the proposition set forth in my amendment is just as strong and just as pressing, and just as humanitarian as any project that was ever presented pertaining to the Mississippi. I can not see, to save my life, why fish should be made of one and fowl of another; why this Government should lend its powerful aid to protect the people in one section from floods and destruction of their property on account of the same, and deny it to the citizenship of another portion of the country. My amendment does not seek at this time to have one dollar appropriated from the coffers of the Government, but merely prescribes that a survey in the interest of navigation should be made between certain points on this river, and that the value of flood-protection work be estimated and reported. But I say to you, here and now, that at the next session of Congress I shall introduce a bill urging that Congress extend to the people who live in the valley of the Savannah River and in the city of Augusta the same protection from floods that it has done in the past to the citizens who live in the Valley of the Mississippi.

There is not a single city located on the Mississippi River or in its valley where the danger to life and property is not a great deal less than the people I represent here. Here you have a city whose taxable value is over $40,000,000, and hundreds of thousands of lives are in peril in this one place; and I do not think that the House should deny to the citizens of this city the same protection that you have heretofore extended to the citizens along the Mississippi River.

Shall favoritism be practiced in the preservation of the property and lives of the citizens of this Republic? Do not the citizens who live in Augusta and that territory bear equally with the citizens in other portions of the country the burdens of this Government? Their interests, their property, the preservation of their lives and the lives of their loved ones should not be discriminated against, and I shall never rest content until this Government, by and through Congress, extends to them the same protection from floods it has heretofore given to cities and people in other sections.

Is it not, Mr. Chairman, in the interests of navigation to keep this river from overflowing its banks and spreading over a vast territory? When the flow recedes it brings back into the channel sand, trees, trash, and such like, which, as you readily know, lessens the navigation and causes the main channel to be filled up, when, if the water was held within its banks by levees, in its wild rush to the sea it would dig the channel deeper and drive before it all of the débris in the river. This readily shows to my mind that it is to the best interests of navigation to have levees built upon the banks of this river, as a lesser burden will be caused to the Government in keeping the channel deep, as the mighty flood flowing in the main channel will lend powerful aid to the accomplishment of the same.

Or, sir, when the dogs of war were loosened upon the European Continent this Government placed at the disposal of the globe-trotters and pleasure seekers of this country not only the Navy but the Treasury, to bring them back to America from the danger of the war zones. The Government reasoned that it was in duty bound to protect the lives and property of its citizens from danger by removing them. Are not the lives and property of the citizens of Augusta in a greater danger than were the lives and the property of the globe-trotters and pleasure seekers? Yet the Government thought the danger was so imminent as to spend the taxpayers' money for that purpose. Shall you deny to my people aid in protecting their lives and their property from a danger that is ever confronting? Should not a portion of the tax money that they pay into the Treasury of this country be spent to protect their lives and their property from destruction?

The cost of levees, to protect the city and its people as planned, will be approximately $2,000,000, and of this amount that city has issued bonds and raised and expended a million dollars. The city has gone as far as it can, and the Government should now come to their aid and cooperate with them in this undertaking. Let me briefly call your attention to the magnitude and the destruction of the flood at Augusta in 1908.

Mr. Chairman, from the headwaters to Augusta the river and its tributaries flow through a mountainous country, the highest point being 4,600 feet above sea level and falling to 103 feet above sea level at Augusta. The total area of watershed for Augusta is 7,285 square miles. The city of Augusta is at the foot of the hills, and from this point to the ocean the Savannah River flows through the coastal plain.

The extreme low flow of the river at Augusta is 2,300 cubic feet per second. Ordinary low flow is 5,000 cubic feet per second. At certain intervals, when there is a heavy rain over any considerable portion of the watershed, this flow is enormously increased, and in times of greatest floods the river has a volume at Augusta of 300,000 feet per second. When these floods come the water is kept within or near the river banks, on account of the high hills on each side, until it reaches Augusta, which is located on a plain on the Georgia side of the river. On the South Carolina side the foothills continue for some miles below the city, but on the Georgia side the hills stop abruptly at the upper limits of the city, and there is no high ground for a point 11 miles farther down the river. This makes a gap through which the water pours, and these floods come at recurring intervals. The first one of which there is any definite records was in 1797.

After the river reaches a stage of 34 feet it overflows the south banks and flows directly through the business and manufacturing section of the city of Augusta, passing to the low ground south of the city. The record shows that the depth of the overflow and high water varies from 3 to 15 feet, according to the locality. There is no way to keep it out, as the water flows in along the entire water front of the city, which is 3 miles. The destruction caused by each of these floods is beyond calculation.

The flood in the year 1908 was a typical one, and the loss of life and property can be taken as a guide in determining the total losses. It is impracticable, even with all data at hand, to cover these, as there are a great many intangible losses which can not be figured in dollars and cents. It is true that these floods are of short duration, but the rise of water is so swift that it is impossible to guard against loss. At 6 p. m. of August 5 the river stage was 19 feet; at 8 a. m., August 6, or 14 hours after, the stage of water was 35 feet, and in a few hours this had reached 39 feet. The entire business section was covered and practically all of the best residence section. In the low ground, where the poor people live, the flood water went to the eaves of the one-story houses, and the ocupants had to be reached through the roof. The large residences on high ground had water on the first floor from 3 to 8 feet deep. All stores were, of course, flooded. The depth of water on office floors of hotels was from 5 to 8 feet. Seven cotton warehouses, 2 grain mills, 3 ice plants, 20 other manufacturing plants, street-railway power house, electric-light plant, waterworks, the union passenger station, 6 railroad terminals, and in fact everything that goes to make up a city was put entirely out of business. The power canal, by which the city furnishes water power to all industries, was torn up for 3 miles; one railroad bridge and one wagon bridge across the Savannah River were washed away entirely, and one span of another wagon bridge was destroyed; 480 stores and over 2,000 residences were under water, and many of the buildings collapsed. By the destruction of the city's water-power development 6,000 factory employees were out of employment for two months, and the city was without water for 40 days.

A table has been prepared showing the damage to the physical property, based on actual expenditures, which, Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to have incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. This table shows that the total loss caused by this one flood was $2,181,000.

Now, in addition to that, there was a loss of wages to mill and factory operatives for eight weeks of $144,000. A loss to merchants and manufacturers due to the interruption and loss of business which is incalculable. The table refers to the flood of 1908, and is typical of all others. Since 1840 there have been 10 such floods.

The city is now powerless to go further to help itself on account of the large cost of protection, but, however, after the 1908 flood they, realizing that the lives of the community depended upon some sort of relief, decided to make a determined effort in that direction. Gen. Kingman, the engineer then in charge of that district, made a thorough examination and reported that the only possible means of protection was by building levees along the water front from high-water ground above the city to high ground below. The city council also called in Mr. B. M. Howard, of New Orleans, who has spent most of his life on the Mississippi River work. His report agreed with that of Gen. Kingman. To be further satisfied, the city engaged A. L. Dabney, of Memphis, and H. T. Croy, of San Francisco. Each of these engineers, acting entirely independently of each other, recommended the construction of levees as the only practical means of protection. The only feasible route was along the river bank, and owing to the caving banks it was necessary first to pave or riprap the banks from the bottom of the river up. A special act of the Georgia Legislature was passed authorizing this city to go beyond the constitutional limits and issue bonds for its protection by building levees, and $1,000,000 worth of bonds was issued, and that sum has already been expended by the citizens on this work.

I challenge any Member of this House to show me a single city along the Mississippi that has spent as large a sum as this city for levee work in proportion to its population. I trust that no one will misunderstand me. I am not complaining about what the Government has done for the protection of the lives and property of the people in other sections of the country, but I do say that fair play and square dealing demands that the same protection be accorded to citizens in this portion of the country, whose lives and property are jeopardized by floods.

I appeal to you gentlemen to adopt this amendment. They ask for nothing more than what it is the duty of the Government to give—protection of their lives and their property. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order ought to be sustained.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina: Page 45, line 4, after the word "thirteen," insert "Savannah River at North Augusta, S. C., with a view to improving the banks on the South Carolina side of the river in the same manner and upon the same terms that the banks on the Georgia side of the river are being improved under the project authorized by the river and harbor acts approved June 25, 1910, and March 4, 1913."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment. I would like to ask the gentleman, Is this in connection with the improvement of a stream for navigation or is this just to protect some private property?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will answer the gentleman frankly. Under the act of 1910 the engineers decided that it was in the interest of navigation, and because they have so decided I want to ask that under that same act the banks on the South Carolina side of the river be investigated with a view of improvement in the same direction and in the same manner.

Mr. MANN. Well, I accept the gentleman's statement, which is not very strong, and I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the committee but one or two minutes. I do not ask the committee to do for the South Carolina side of the Savannah River what is done on the Mississippi River in the way of protection against floods, but I ask it to do for the South Carolina side of the river only that which is done for the Georgia side of the river. Opposite to the city of Augusta, to which my good friend from Georgia has just referred, is located the city of North Augusta, S. C. Whenever a flood has occurred and the city of Augusta, Ga., has suffered damage, the city of North Augusta, S. C., has been damaged likewise, the difference being only in the amount of damage done, because less property is located at North Augusta, S. C. Now, under the act of 1910 the Government cooperated with the city of Augusta in constructing certain improvements to protect the city of Augusta, Ga., against the floods of the Savannah River. Water must find an outlet, and the only result of the construction of the revetment work upon the banks on the Georgia side will be to increase the flood waters on the South Carolina side whenever a flood occurs. The people of North Augusta, S. C., whose property is injured whenever there is a flood, can not understand, if in the interest of navigation the Georgia side of the river can be improved, why in the interest of navigation the South Carolina side of the river can not be improved. If there be any engineering reason it can only be ascertained by an examination and survey, such as I now ask for. If there is any reason other than an engineering reason I would like to know it. You can not discriminate against the banks on the South Carolina side in favor of the banks of the river on the Georgia side, and I trust that this committee will allow this authority for a survey to be inserted so that the Congress may be informed by the engineers of the War Department whether there is any reason why the same improvements should not be made on both banks of the Savannah River.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cane River, La., from Grand Ecore to Colfax.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BURGESS. There are two committee amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 46, by inserting after line 15 the following:
"Little River and tributaries, Castor and Dugdemonia, from the mouth of Little River to Winnfield, La., on the Dugdemonia, and to Olla, La., on the Castor."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 46, strike out lines 16 and 17 and insert in lieu thereof the following bayous: "Courtableau, Boeuf, and Cocodrie, La."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Intracoastal waterway from the Arroyo Colorado to Point Isabel, Tex.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting after line 18 on page 47:
"Galveston and Sabine section of the inland waterway, Texas:
"(1) A channel 5 feet deep and 40 feet in bottom width from the Sabine River along the proposed route to East Bay Bayou; thence within the shoal line to the northward of west Galveston Bay to Robinsons Bayou; and thence via Robinsons Lake and Whites Lake to upper Galveston Bay."

(2) The saving, if any, by the construction of a 5-foot channel along this route in the ultimate cost of a 9-foot channel, should such 9-foot channel be adopted.

(3) The best and most economical route as well as the one best adapted for the service of all commercial interests for such 9-foot channel, and whether or not the construction of such a 9-foot channel is now advisable.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that amendment. I would like to ask the gentleman if that is a survey for a canal?

Mr. BURGESS. No. That is a survey for adjusting a waterway that has been approved and not included in the bill. This is to determine between two routes, Houston or Galveston.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not for a canal?

Mr. BURGESS. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. Or pertaining to an intercoastal canal?

Mr. BURGESS. No, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BURGESS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—yeas 90, noes 11.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers another committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after paragraph at end of line 18, page 47, the following two paragraphs:

"The L'Anguille River, with a view of ascertaining whether locks and dams should be built to afford slack-water navigation to Madison on the St. Francis River.

"The St. Francis River, from Madison, St. Francis County, in Clay County, Ark."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Port Clinton Harbor, Ohio.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 48, after line 7, insert:

"South Fork of Kentucky River, Ky., with a view to constructing an additional lock and dam."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Port Clinton Harbor, Ohio.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr WHITE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 48, line 12, after the word "Ohio," insert: "Cheat River in Pennsylvania and West Virginia; Tygarts River, West Fork River, Kanawha River, and its tributaries, all in West Virginia; Muskingum River and its tributaries, Scioto River and its tributaries, Miami River and its tributaries, all in the State of Ohio; Maumee River and its tributaries, Ohio and Indiana; Kankakee River, and the Wabash River and its tributaries, Illinois and Indiana, with a view to devising plans for flood control and determining the extent to which the United States should cooperate with the States and other communities and interests in carrying out such plans, its share being based upon the value of protection to navigation and promote the interests of commerce at all stages of the river."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Texas both reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I make it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Ohio want to be heard?

Mr. WHITE. Yes; I would like to be heard on it.

Mr. MANN. Then I will withhold while the gentleman makes his statement.

[Mr. WHITE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes a point of order against the amendment; also the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS].

The Chair thinks that the point of order should be sustained. The flood protection along the Mississippi River and the building of levees there are authorized and provided for by this bill on account, as the Chair understands, of a certain act passed in 1872 or thereabouts, authorizing the creation of the Mississippi River Commission, which is given jurisdiction over levees along the Mississippi River; and this present bill extends jurisdiction over flood protection to the Mississippi River Commission. The cases are not analogous, and the Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order against the amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Muskegon River, Mich., from the head of Muskegon Lake to Newaygo, or to the Grand Rapids-Muskegon Power Co. dam.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 48, after line 24, insert the following: "Saugatuck Harbor and Kalamazoo River, Mich., with a view to securing increased depth to the town of Douglas."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Missouri River, from Kansas City, Kans., to the western limits of St. Joseph, Mo.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 49, after line 19, strike out the words "western limits of St. Joseph, Mo.," and insert "northern limits of Florence, Nebr."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Lake Washington Ship Canal, Wash., from the lock to deep water in Puget Sound.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 51, in lines 16 and 17, the words "from the lock to deep water in Puget Sound."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Umpqua River, Oreg., bar and entrance.

Mr. BURGESS. I desire to recur to the bottom of page 50.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to recur to the bottom of page 50. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURGESS. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers at this point a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 50, at the end of line 22, insert:

"Napa River, Cal., from the city of Napa to the head of navigation, with a view to straightening the channel and making necessary cut-offs, including the consideration of any proposition for cooperation on the part of local interests.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mouth of Snake River and Nome Harbor, Alaska.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the gentleman want his amendment to go?

Mr. FREAR. I understood that it was proper to present it at this time as a substitute amendment.

Mr. MANN. It is a substitute for the bill, and I think it should come in after the end of the last section. It should not be offered until the reading of the bill is finished.

Mr. FREAR. Then I will ask the Clerk to withhold it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it should come in at the end of the bill.

Mr. FREAR. I will offer it later.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the act of Congress approved March 4, 1909, providing that all tugboats using the Potomac River, where the same is spanned by the new railway and new highway bridges, be equipped with devices for lowering their smokestacks, is hereby amended to include "power boats," meaning any boat, vessel, or craft propelled by machinery, whether the machinery be only principal or auxiliary power of propulsion; and the provisions and requirements of the said act are hereby made applicable to "power boats" as herein defined.

Mr. MOORE. I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reserves a point of order.

Mr. MOORE. I think the point of order was made to this paragraph last year for some reason or other, and it went out of the bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think that is correct, but I hope no point of order will be made against it this time.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman explain the reason for it? It will require a lowering of the smokestacks on steam vessels.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] is prepared to explain it.

Mr. MOORE. It would seem to impose an unnecessary hardship upon the owners of small boats. That is the reason I would like to have it explained.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, by a prior act, tugboats navigating the Potomac River and passing through the draw of this bridge were required to have provision for automatically lowering their smoke stacks. The object of this amendment is to make the same act applicable to small motor boats. These boats can comply with the same provision of law that has been complied with by tugboats at even less expense and with less burden. In the opinion of the War Department it is an unnecessary burden upon the operation of this bridge to have the draw opened so frequently for small-sized motor boats, when they could easily and inexpensively be equipped with smokestacks that could be lowered, without requiring the opening of the draw.

The committee were unanimous in the recommendation, it was approved by the War Department, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MOORE. Is this not for the convenience of the bridge tender, who does not want to open the draw?

Mr. HULL. No; it is not for the convenience of the bridge tender. It is for the convenience of the public who travel over the bridge.

Mr. MOORE. It applies only to Potomac River?

Mr. HULL. It applies only to the Potomac River.

Mr. MOORE. If it applied generally, I am frank to say that I should make the point of order, because one of the grievances of the public is that the bridge tenders are sometimes indifferent to their duties.

Mr. STAFFORD. One of the grievances of the public is that they are obliged to open the draw for every little motor boat.

Mr. MOORE. But navigation has the right of way.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed to define and establish anchorage grounds for vessels in all harbors, rivers, bays, and other navigable waters of the United States whenever it is manifest to the said Secretary that the maritime or commercial interests of the United States require such anchorage grounds for safe navigation and the establishment of such anchorage grounds shall have been recommended by the Chief of Engineers, and to adopt suitable rules and regulations in relation thereto; and such rules and regulations shall be enforced by the Revenue-Cutter Service under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That at ports or places where there is no revenue cutter available such rules and regulations may be enforced by the Chief of Engineers under the direction of the Secretary of War. In the event of the violation of any such rules and regulations by the owner, master, or person in charge of any vessel, such owner, master, or person in charge of such vessel shall be liable to a penalty of $100; and the said vessel may be holden for the payment of such penalty and may be seized and proceeded against summarily by libel for the recovery of the same in any United States district court for the district within which such vessel may be and in the name of the officer designated by the Secretary of War.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 55, line 5, after the word "war," insert: "Provided, That no part of the moneys herein appropriated by this bill shall be expended except to maintain existing projects in their present condition."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this amendment if adopted will cut out everything except the maintenance items, and according to the report of the committee the maintenance items amount to $4,760,540.

Mr. Chairman, under present conditions we are facing a deficit in the Treasury. The prospect is that we shall have to issue bonds in time of war abroad. We should cut these expenditures down as much as possible. Certainly there is no Member of the House who has heard the discussion throughout this bill who will deny that there are a lot of items that could be done without. Certainly no Member of this House who has heard the discussion on this bill from start to finish will deny that a lot of expenditures in it will be wasted.

According to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], in his speech at the outset of the consideration of this bill, if we had cut $15,000,000 out of the $20,000,000 appropriated at the last session of Congress we would have saved to the people of the country $15,000,000. I think, Mr. Chairman, that by cutting out $33,000,000 by the filibuster in the Senate we saved the people of the United States $33,000,000.

I believe as Mr. TREADWAY says, and as the minority leader said in his argument on the motion made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], that if we had cut the $20,000,000, which the bill finally carried, down to $5,000,000, we would have saved in addition to the $33,000,000, $15,000,000 more. I believe, Mr. Chairman, by adopting this amendment which I have offered here we will save to the people of this country at this time $30,000,000 on this bill that is now before the House.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. No; I have not the time. Now, I want to read what the leader of the minority said on that motion that was offered by the gentleman from Washington at the last session:

Mr. MANN. That is better. We appropriated $16,000,000 in 1899, nothing in 1898, nothing in 1900, nothing in 1901, and in 1902 we appropriated $26,000,000, and we had made no further appropriation up to the time that the Democratic convention met in 1904. That convention, foreseeing the future, foreseeing that in the Sixty-third Congress the Democratic Party would appropriate $41,000,000 last year and try to appropriate $53,000,000 this year—and even if it appropriates $20,000,000 this year it will appropriate $63,000,000 in two years, where the Republicans have appropriated $26,000,000 in four years—in one of its planks adopted this language:

"Large reductions can easily be made in the annual expenditures of the Government without impairing the efficiency of any branch of the public service, and we shall insist upon the strictest economy and frugality compatible with vigorous and efficient civil, military, and naval administration as a right of the people too clear to be denied or withheld."

Think of it! A Democratic national convention said that $16,000,000 in two years was gross extravagance; that $26,000,000 in four years was a wanton expenditure, and the country has not changed very much since then, as far as any river and harbor improvements are concerned. And now last year this Congress having appropriated $41,000,000, as much as a Republican Congress had appropriated in six years, you insist upon appropriating another $20,000,000 in the face of the platform of the last Democratic national convention. I know you want to forget it, but I am going to read it to you. I do not blame you for wishing you could tear it out of the platform:

"We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil. We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people."

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CALLAWAY. Oh, no; do not vote yet. Wait and hear what you have been saying to the country through all these years. [Applause on the Republican side.] Listen! I am repeating this because it is one of the times that the minority leader hit the bull's-eye; but he will not do it on this bill, I am afraid, for he does not keep the same track long at a time. I wish the minority leader would follow the speech that he made then through this bill.

Mr. MANN continues:

I am glad to note that a few gentlemen on the Democratic side can still applaud that utterance in that platform without blushing. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Most of them can not do it. [Applause on the Republican side.] What is the situation confronting us?

Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not ask to extend my remarks in the RECORD. I am going to finish the reading of this, and you can give me the time now to read it or I will take it later.

Mr. MANN. How much more time does the gentleman want?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I continue the reading:

The ink is hardly dry on the signature of the Clerk of this House transmitting to the Senate a bill to increase the taxes of the people and now you propose, in the face of the record of the past, in the face of the fact that no Congress preceding the last Congress has ever appropriated or passed two rivers and harbors bills in any one Congress, you propose to reverse all the policy of the Government in the past, at this time when we are laying new burdens of taxation upon the people, and appropriate the money, which is not needed, for present maintenance of projects. Every man who signs a promissory note will contribute to these river and harbor improvements which might wait over without damage; every man who sends an express or freight package will contribute to these river and harbor expenditures; every man who sends a telephone or telegraph message will contribute to these river and harbor expenditures; every man who signs a deed will pay 50 cents on each $500 of value that it may be sunk in river and harbor improvements; every man who takes out life insurance will pay 8 cents on each $100 of insurance to contribute to these river and harbor expenditures; every man who takes out fire insurance will pay 5 mills on each $1 of premium to the same end; every man who is hard up and mortgages his property will contribute 25 cents on each $500 of mortgage above $1,000 to this end. Is it worth the while? Do you think on the Democratic side of the House that you want to go to the country upon the proposition that you propose to appropriate now $20,000,000 for river and harbor improvements while you are in the meanwhile adding to the taxes of the people?

Do you think now that you want to place a burden of an extra $34,000,000 in addition to that upon the backs of the people; that you will saddle them with this additional tax? Every man in this country now who has to renew his note goes up and pays an additional burden upon it to be put into the river and harbor appropriations, when we can, if you adopt this amendment I have offered, save the rivers and harbors in the country in the condition that they are in now—and Lord knows there is not going to be much crowding of traffic on them with conditions as they are at present [applause and laughter on the Republican side]—you can leave them as they are for another year, and then, if our traffic conditions get so congested and crowded that we need these rivers, you can begin to use them by scraping the bottoms of some of them with some of these dredges that they explained about, not that we needed them to clean out the Arkansas River, but that we had them and did not know what else to do with them, and now we think they ought to be put to work.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CALLAWAY) there were—ayes 57, noes 120.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That for the necessary traveling, clerical, and miscellaneous expenses of the American section of the Permanent International Association of Navigation Congresses in connection with its attendance on the thirteenth convention of said association to be held at Stockholm, Sweden, in 1915, $5,200 is hereby appropriated, this amount to be in addition to the annual appropriation of $3,000 provided for the support and maintenance of said association by the act of June 28, 1902, and to remain available until expended.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the substitute which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FREAR offers as a substitute for the bill:

"That the sum of $5,000,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of the moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works: Provided, That allotments for maintenance from the amount hereby appropriated shall be made by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers: Provided further, That allotments for the Mississippi River, from the Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission as approved by the Chief of Engineers: And provided further, That at the beginning of the next session of Congress a special report shall be made to Congress by the Secretary of War, showing the amount allotted under this appropriation to each work of maintenance."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I have offered the same substitute amendment that was voted upon at the last session of Congress, in substantially the same language. It provides, generally speaking, for $5,000,000 in place of the amount stated in the bill. I do not know what the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] would have been, but this amendment provides for $5,000,000 to be distributed by the Army Engineers, as was proposed at the last session and rejected.

Mr. Chairman, I have made frequent objections throughout the consideration of this bill and I have offered many amendments. I have endeavored not to take any unnecessary time, and I do not propose to do so now. I just want to say this: I believe we are as anxious to save money now as we were then, and as the Members of this side of the House voted almost unanimously in favor of the substitute at that time, I hope they will do so now.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Conditions have not changed, so far as the finances of the Government are concerned, and we are practically in the same situation. In view of that fact I appeal to those Members of the House who believe that we ought to provide a drastic limitation on these bills to vote at this time for the substitute which I have offered.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I have followed the reading of the substitute. It leaves out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. FREAR. It is the identical substitute which was offered at the last session.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. But it is the present law without the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FREAR) there were—ayes 68, noes 109.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20189, and had directed him to report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes, sir. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CALLAWAY moves that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, with instruction to that committee to report it back to the House at once with all items struck out except those providing for maintenance of existing projects and appropriate $4,760,540 only to maintain present existing river and harbor projects.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-nine gentlemen have risen in the affirmative, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The SPEAKER. The other side is demanded.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Texas has made the point of no quorum, and it is too late to demand the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and forty Members are present. [Applause.] The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Seventy-one gentlemen have risen, a sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 164, nays 81, not voting 179, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. SPARKMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 37 minutes a. m.) the House adjourned until to-day, Wednesday, January 20, 1915, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication of the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required for the service of the Panama Canal for services expected to be rendered by it in caring in its hospitals for members of the military establishment on duty in the Canal Zone during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916 (H. Doc. No. 1506); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication of the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, to pay the Panama Canal for services expected to be rendered by it in caring in its hospitals for members of the military establishment on duty in the Canal Zone during that year (H. Doc. No. 1507); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SAUNDERS, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18685) to repeal penalties on foreign-built vessels owned by Americans, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1299), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GOEKE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 20818) to authorize the Brunot Island Bridge Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the back channel of the Ohio River, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1302), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SAUNDERS, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18686) to provide for provisional certificates of registry of vessels abroad, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1303), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the resolution (S. J. Res. 196) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant permission to the Southern Commercial Congress to place a tablet at Gamboa, Canal Zone, as a memorial to the late Senator John T. Morgan, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1300), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. MOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 15686) for the relief of William W. Fineren, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1293), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. POU, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16166) for the relief of James F. Gorman, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1294), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18038) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Louis Landram, administrator of William J. Landram, deceased, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1297), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. EDMONDS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1058) for the relief of Dommick Taheny and John W. Mortimer, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1298), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18474) for the relief of William J. Blake, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1295), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16650) for the relief of Thomas P. Darr, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1296), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 21037) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1301), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20463) granting an increase of pension to C. L. Belknap, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 20, 1915.

(Legislative day of Friday, January 15, 1915.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, on yesterday I spoke of the delay of ships in foreign ports as one reason for the present condition and also as a ground for increase of rates. In the minds of some this constitutes the most serious feature of the condition which now exists. I have received a letter from the vice president and manager of the International Mercantile Marine Co. which is so apposite to this subject that I will read it to the Senate:

INTERNATIONAL MERCANTILE MARINE CO.,
OFFICE OF THE VICE PRESIDENT,
No. 9 Broadway, New York, January 19, 1915.

Hon. T. E. BURTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your favor of the 18th instant received, and I expect to write you to-morrow giving the information which you desire regarding the Liverpool Cotton Exchange.

The shipping situation to-day is very seriously complicated by the terrible congestion which exists in ocean traffic at all the principal European ports, including London, Liverpool, Genoa, and Havre, and the result is that steamers are being delayed many weeks in port there instead of being dispatched in not over one week, so that you will readily understand it takes many more steamers to do the same work than under normal conditions.

In the case of our London service, we have 10 steamers to-day doing the work of 5 in ordinary times, and the cost of operation is therefore tremendously increased, without any proportionate advantage to either the shipper or shipowner.

The facilities of the ports are being taxed to their very utmost, and I can see no reason to hope that conditions will materially change as long as the war lasts, as labor of all kinds is very scarce in Europe on account of the drain of the war.

Meanwhile steamers are being detained at Havre and London for six weeks, and longer in many cases, and the whole situation is causing us the most grave concern.

Yours, very truly, P. A. S. FRANKLIN.

There is a reference in the letter to the resolution or other action taken by the Liverpool Cotton Exchange about which, when I receive more complete information, I shall again address the Senate. I think this is one serious factor in the cotton situation. As I understand, at the very beginning of the war the Liverpool Cotton Exchange decided not to make any further purchases. As this is one of the principal sources of the demand for this staple, such action must have inevitably caused a decreased demand and a lowering of the price.

I have already taken up in the list of questions the first five. They are given on pages 1863 and 1864 of the RECORD of Monday's proceedings. I now take up question No. 6:

"6. Will it be the policy to operate the boats on a profit or no-profit basis? If on a no-profit basis, will it not drive all American shipping off the routes invaded? If on a profit basis, can you demonstrate on what routes and by what economic saving this can be accomplished to better advantage than by private shipping?"

In a way this question is the most vital of all. What is intended? How are we to know about this? How is the country to know? Will these boats be purchased and operated at a great loss, or will they be operated in the same manner in which private enterprises are conducted? It goes without saying that if they are operated at a loss this bill is merely an indirect means of providing a subsidy to some, and a subsidy which will not be of general benefit to the people at large, for no such line could carry more than a comparatively insignificant fraction of the exports of the United States. This can not be too clearly understood. These boats acquired by the Government would not carry more than a twentieth of the foreign trade of the United States. If it is the policy to carry this proportion of exports or imports at a loss, some special interest or locality will gain the benefit.

I wish to call attention again to the incongruous, the awkward, the unprecedented method that this bill proposes for entering into the shipping business. The Government of the United States does not buy these boats direct. There is the device of a corporation. That corporation is to be organized under the laws of any State of the Union or of the District of Columbia or under the Federal law. As was pointed out by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] yesterday, there is no Federal law of a general nature under which there could be an incorporation. I suppose we might enact a special statute which would authorize the incorporation of a shipping company. That is a very unusual thing to do, but it might be done.

Now, let us examine the other provisions of the bill. Fifty-one per cent of the capital stock is to be subscribed by the Government of the United States; 49 per cent by private subscribers, if they will take it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator is in error. He stated that these vessels would be purchased by the corporation.

Mr. BURTON. I perhaps should not have said that. They are to be operated by the corporation. They are to be purchased and turned over to the corporation.

Mr. NELSON. In the substitute which will be pressed here the very first line reads as follows:

That the President is hereby authorized to acquire, by purchase or construction.

It is the President himself, not even the board that is provided for in the bill, not the corporation but simply the President.

Mr. BURTON. That is correct. Eventually, however, they are to be turned over to the corporation for operation.

It is improbable that any considerable private subscriptions will be made. There will be such doubt as to cause hesitancy in this regard. But it is a corporation, like any of the corporations of the country, which is expected to conduct this business and operate these ships. At least, calculations should be made of what would happen in case there should be private subscribers. Possibly some might subscribe for a sinister purpose. Others might subscribe in order that they might have an opportunity to control the operations. Others possibly might subscribe in the hope that it will be profitable.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Has the Senator any idea that anyone will subscribe outside of the Government for this stock?

Mr. BURTON. I think they may. Even though they do not subscribe from the ordinary motives which actuate investors.

Mr. NELSON. Necessarily there will have to be enough subscribers to qualify the directors under the State law or under whichever law the corporation is incorporated. The directors and officers will probably have to own some stock to be qualified.

Mr. BURTON. Even those who are acting in the interest of the Government will have to acquire stock.

Mr. NELSON. Outside of that, does the Senator believe that anyone else will subscribe for the stock?

Mr. BURTON. As I have said, I think they may for a sinister motive, if for no other.

Mr. KENYON. Could there be any other purpose than a sinister one? Here is 51 per cent of stock which represents a proposition of not making money. The 49 per cent would represent the proposition of making money, and who would subscribe for stock where a majority of the stock represented a proposition of not making money, but merely for the public interest? I think the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is right; there would not be anyone who would subscribe unless it should be for a sinister purpose. But what would be the sinister purpose?

Mr. BURTON. I am coming to that in a minute. Of course, if they were actuated by the ordinary motives which induce persons to subscribe to the stock of corporations we would not expect that a dollar of the 49 per cent would be taken except under this very absurd and incongruous condition, which would make it necessary for those who represent the Government to subscribe to a part of the 49 per cent.

Mr. KENYON. Had we not as well face the proposition and take all the stock?

Mr. BURTON. So far as the financial backing is concerned.

Mr. KENYON. That is the practical question.

Mr. BURTON. Under the incorporation laws of all the States there are two classes of corporations recognized; corporations for profit and corporations not for profit. The former class includes the ordinary business corporation which is organized in order to provide larger capital and secure the superior advantages which naturally belong to an incorporated company as compared with an individual or partnership.

Corporations not for profit are formed for a variety of purposes, benevolent, educational, and the like. In my own State, and I think in many others, the directors of corporations not for profit are personally liable for debts, but I take it this corporation would necessarily be classed as a corporation for profit.

Now, in answer to the question of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], let me call his attention to what might happen—and, in fact, has happened—under the form of incorporation in vogue in the States. A few persons—possibly for the sake of defeating the very objects of this bill—would take stock. They might subscribe in such a way that no one could foresee their motives; but they would be stockholders. They would be entitled to representation on the board of directors. I think the Government of the United States would be the very last organization to deny to minority stockholders representation on the board of directors. That might be very well in some big trust or monopoly, but it would not do for the United States. The corporation would begin to do business with one or more minority directors. It might decide upon purchasing a boat at a very high price or upon contracting for the construction of a boat at an enormous figure; then the minority director might protest and say: "This is a wasteful method." Suppose we pass over that contingency, however, on the ground that this bill is intended to meet an emergency. The corporation begins to do business, and shippers say: "What did you organize this corporation for? Was it not to give us cheaper rates?" Suppose cheaper rates are fixed from the ports of the United States to foreign countries than the prevailing rates in the shipping market and that such rates were unprofitable. What would then happen? Immediately the minority directors or the minority stockholders go into the courts and say: "We object to this method of procedure. This corporation is not established for altruistic purposes; it was established as a business enterprise. As minority stockholders we are entitled to a reasonable profit on our investment. Though our holdings be small, you can not confiscate our property."

If that proposition were to be taken into the courts, it is not difficult to see what the result would be. The courts ever guard with the utmost sacredness the rights of the minority. Suppose some district attorney comes in and says, "Oh, these subscribers came here as trouble makers. They did not come in good faith." In the first place, it would be very difficult to prove that fact. Again, it might not be true. There is a great variety of motives which lead men to make investments. Nothing is more manifest from an examination of investments than that some persons invest without consideration. As Mr. Bagehot says in explaining the cause of a crisis, "a great many stupid people have a great deal of stupid money," and the glamor which pertains to a Government corporation might lead a considerable number of investors to place their money in the venture.

Now, I should like to have an explanation from some one defending this bill how a court would rule in such a case. Would the corporation answer, "We are running this corporation not for the benefit of the stockholders, not in the ordinary way in which corporations are managed, but with a view to accomplishing a broad general purpose in the lowering of freight rates on transoceanic traffic"?

Why, Mr. President, that answer would not hold. The conclusive reply to such a position would be, "If you are entering the shipping business for the purpose of lowering freight rates, why does not the Government do it directly with its own money and with its own agencies? They are abundant for the purpose."

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Ohio has answered my question and has confirmed the thought that was in my mind. This scheme of having the public buy any of this stock while the Government is to control 51 per cent of it is an utterly nonpractical scheme.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. And, as the Senator suggests, nobody would buy any of this stock except for some ulterior purpose. If they did, they would be candidates for the insane asylum, I should think, or should have a guardian appointed. Now, what ought to be done, if anything is done? Is it not true that the Government ought to take hold of it, and not by subterfuge, such as is contained in this bill, try to deceive the public into the impression that they are to have an opportunity to buy something that is worth something, when in fact it is not?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. The fault I find with this section is that it is in the nature of a subterfuge. It is not frank when we come to analyze it. I should like to see the Government take hold of the matter and control it entirely. Of course, I know the Senator from Ohio, and I do not agree on that proposition. But, so far as that paragraph is concerned, we might agree that that would be the only way that it could be done, and that this paragraph is not at all feasible.

Mr. BURTON. As the Senator from Iowa has suggested, this is in reality a subterfuge. It is proposing that nearly half of the stock of this corporation may be open to subscription by citizens of the United States; and yet, if I can interpret what is in the minds of the advocates of this bill, it is an invitation to them to throw away their money, saying to them, "The Government, rich as it is, wants to go into a venture that will surely be a losing one; but we only wish to bear 51 per cent of the loss. We wish the good people who have the money to bear the rest of it, and thereby perhaps lose all that they have."

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire of the Senator from Ohio if the Government did not find it desirable to purchase the outstanding shares of the stock of the Panama Railroad Co., so as to get complete control of that corporation, finding that a minority stockholder would be embarrassing to the Government in the operation of the corporation and really a menace to its proper administration?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly; that was a transaction of that character.

I want here to call attention to a fact suggested by the question of the Senator from Kansas. Under this bill you are seeking to create a condition which the Government in its management of that corporation sought to terminate; that is, in this bill you are reaching out for private subscribers, while in the practical management of the Panama Railroad the effort of the Government, after a trial, was to do away with private subscribers. It would be to utterly ignore the lesson taught in the management of that corporation. Of course, it is the general impression that private individuals will not subscribe to the stock, but I do not know whether that will prove entirely true.

Is it best, even so, to leave the management of this corporation entirely to a system of bureaucracy? Would it not be better to have an infusion of private ownership as a check upon wasteful or extravagant management? The proposition is one that is startling in the extreme. It is a proposition to give to the executive department of the Government the right not only to subscribe $10,000,000 of stock to be paid from the Treasury of the United States, 51 per cent in the first instance and 49 per cent additional if the private subscribers do not take it, but that is not the end of it. The Government can go on until the subscriptions aggregate twenty millions, forty millions, one hundred millions, or any other amount, until the day when Congress should raise its hand and say, "This whole project is wrong, and we will repeal the law."

Suppose, on the other hand, this enterprise is to be conducted on a profit basis, as corporations are expected to be operated. To what conclusion will that bring us? In the first place, you will be putting in control of this corporation men either without any experience at all or men of far less experience in the business than those now engaged in it. You will be introducing into the freight trade across the ocean men who have no affiliations with shippers, men who have not the capability or the opportunity to obtain freight charters as those have who are already engaged in this occupation.

Still further, as I suggested a day or two ago, the mere running of ships does not constitute freight traffic. It is necessary to have wharves and warehouses and terminals where the freight can be loaded and unloaded. When ships have been purchased and the line started there immediately arises a necessity for the accessories of the shipping business, and oftentimes they are not only an important part, but the most important part of the business.

The proposed shipping board would also be confronted with the condition that Government management always costs more than does private management. I ask the proponents of this measure what would be the advantage over privately owned ships? You can search far and wide and find no advantages, but manifold disadvantages.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. I find, on examining the corporation laws of the various States and of the District of Columbia, that they all contemplate that a corporation must be formed by persons. They say such and such persons may form a corporation.

Does the Senator from Ohio believe that under such laws one government can step into the jurisdiction of another government and organize a corporation? Instead of individual effort, is not this a corporation to be formed by the Government of the United States under the laws of a State? Does the Senator know of any instance where that has been done, where one government has sought to create a corporation under the laws of another government?

Mr. BURTON. Such as the United States going into the State of Pennsylvania and forming a corporation, or the State of Pennsylvania going into the State of New Jersey and forming a corporation?

Mr. NELSON. As individuals we will assume that the Senator and I and other Members of this body could, provided we were otherwise qualified, go into any State and form a corporation, signing articles of incorporation as individuals. That is one condition. But here is a case where it is proposed to have individuals, not in their own right or in their own behalf, but as representatives of another Government, the Government of the United States, go into a State and form a corporation, the Government to hold a majority of the stock. Does the Senator believe that that can be done or that it ought to be done?

Mr. BURTON. It certainly ought not to be done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. The usual method is for a certain number of persons resident in a State to sign articles of incorporation.

Mr. NELSON. Now, will the Senator allow me further?

Mr. BURTON. In just a moment. Those articles of incorporation are filed with the secretary of state or other official at the capital of the State. Then the signers of the articles of incorporation advertise for stock subscriptions. Fancy the United States Government signing one of those articles.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, the law of the District of Columbia relating to the incorporation of companies, in section 605, provides:

> Any three or more persons who desire to form a company for the purpose of carrying on any enterprise or business—

And so forth.

Mr. BURTON. What number of persons is specified?

Mr. NELSON. It says "any three or more persons who desire to form a company." Could the Government of the United States, under that law, form a corporation?

Mr. BURTON. I think not. In the first place the law does not contemplate that the initial steps shall be taken by any except individuals. In the next place it does not contemplate that any Government, State or National, desires to enter into any such enterprise or is qualified to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has called the Senator's attention to the very subject to which I was going to call his attention.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, does the Senator think there would be any objection to the members composing the shipping board forming such a corporation? That board will be made up of three persons residing in the District of Columbia, and why could they not take out articles of incorporation under the laws of the District of Columbia, the United States taking 51 per cent of that stock, and such stock being voted by the members of the shipping board as trustees? Would there be any objection to that sort of an organization?

Mr. BURTON. Perhaps there would be no insuperable objection, Mr. President; but while I have no prejudice against industrial corporations, I do not think it is an appropriate or justifiable field of activity for the Federal Government.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have listened with great interest to the very exhaustive discussion of this question by the Senator from Ohio. I should like to have him explain the difference between the measure under consideration and the system under which the Panama Railroad and Steamship Line is operated.

Mr. BURTON. I am not sure that I am familiar with the management of the Panama Railroad and Steamship Line. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] no doubt can furnish the information.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, all of the stock of the Panama Railroad Co. is owned by the Government of the United States. It is held in trust by the Secretary of War for the Government. It is managed by a board of directors, of which the Secretary of War is the chairman, or formerly was. The board of directors elect officers, including a general manager, and that general manager, who is also vice president, attends to the executive business of the corporation. He charters or purchases ships upon the authorization of the board of directors; but, as I have said, the Government owns all the stock of the corporation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand that it is a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; it is organized under the laws of the State of New York. Under the law each director must have a share of stock in his name; so the directors nominally do have stock, a share being transferred to each of them, which they hold in trust for the Government. In this way they are qualified under the laws of the State of New York to act as directors.

Mr. BURTON. But, Mr. President, it is desirable to call attention to the very essential difference between the Government's participation in that transaction and the one proposed by this bill. The Government proceeded with the construction of the Panama Canal. In such construction it was necessary to have a railroad paralleling the proposed canal route. That railroad was necessary for the carriage of supplies; it was especially required for the carrying away of material excavated in the numerous cuts. The Government of the United States could have built another railway at its own expense as a part of the means of constructing the Panama Canal, but there was a railroad already there which it was thought desirable to acquire.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I understand that the work contemplated by the shipping bill is very different. The Panama Railroad and steamships have been operated by the Government for the purpose of carrying out a Government project.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. To facilitate the Government's own business. Under the shipping bill the Government is to enter upon an enterprise designed to serve private interests, and, I might add, an enterprise which is expected to be a losing venture from the start and the taxpayers to bear the loss.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I see the difference, but if the Government can operate the one by means of a corporation organized under State law, I should like the Senator to explain why it can not with equal facility operate the other.

Mr. BURTON. I suppose it could do so. I question whether it will appear that the management has compared in efficiency and economy with that of privately owned lines.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. In order that the RECORD may be accurate I desire to state that when the Government acquired from the French company the Panama Canal property among the assets of that company was the Panama Railroad. It had been constructed by the old French company for the purpose, of course, of constructing the canal. The railroad company was among the assets of the French corporation. The question occurred to the President at the time this property was acquired, What should be done with the railroad? That was one of the questions which Mr. Roosevelt had to settle.

There were three propositions made, if I am not interrupting the Senator too far.

Mr. BURTON. No, indeed.

Mr. BRISTOW. One was that it should be sold to private interests and that the Government should then employ this privately controlled, owned, and operated railroad to do the business which was necessary, supplementing the construction of the canal. Another proposition was that the Government should still own it and lease it. The third proposition was that it should retain it and operate it as the French company had.

Mr. Roosevelt finally determined that it was best to keep complete control of the corporation, to acquire all of its stock—Mr. Taft was then Secretary of War and had control of the construction of the canal—and operate it in connection with the construction of the canal, since it was necessary to have the railroad, and while it was not necessary to have the steamships, it was thought desirable to have the steamships. Then, in addition to the Government's own business, which was very heavy, it was thought advisable to continue to operate it as a commercial line, so as to keep open during the period of construction the commercial route of transportation by way of Panama.

So the railroad has been operated by the Government for something like 10 years now, and I think with success. There have been some mistakes made and some things done that I do not think have been justified, but that has not been the fault of the managers of the corporation, but due to political influences, which in my opinion originated in Congress, and not with the administration of the corporation or the canal.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I understand the difference between the work which these companies are designed to perform; and in the case of the Panama Canal I very heartily approve the principle underlying the Government ownership of the ships and the railroad for the purpose of perfecting a great Government scheme. It was in no way similar in that regard, however, to the measure that is now before the Congress. The Government was simply using its own railroad and its own ships to dig the canal, which was thought at that time to be for the benefit of the people of the United States, and to carry on the work necessary to its completion. It seems to me it ought to have been done very much more cheaply than it could have been done if owned by a private company. I do not think it is at all in a class with the measure now being considered by the Congress.

I arose only to ask the Senator a question. I think, however, that notwithstanding the fact that the measure under consideration is intended to build up and promote private interests at Government expense—a scheme which I regard wrong in principle and necessarily disappointing in results—at the same time I can see no reason why it could not be operated and managed under a corporation organized under a State law, just as the Panama Co. is organized and operated. The pernicious principles involved in the general scheme would not affect the practicability of the development and operation of the company.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi has clearly stated the distinction between the two transactions, namely, the acquisition and control of the Panama Railroad and Steamship Line on the one hand, and this proposed corporation for a Government line on the other hand. The supplemental statement of the Senator from Kansas also throws light upon the subject, because it shows how this line came to be acquired, namely, that at least a controlling interest in the stock then belonged to the French New Panama Canal Co., which in 1904 sold its interest to the Government of the United States. So, in acquiring the rights and franchises of that company in the canal, it was found that among their possessions was this railroad, or a majority of the stock. What share of the stock did they possess?

Mr. BRISTOW. They had a very large majority. There were a number of American stockholders and some European stockholders; but there were only about 400 shares that it was difficult to acquire. For quite a time some of the small shareholders hesitated to dispose of their holdings, but finally they were all obtained.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator in order to state that the stock was acquired in 1904?

Mr. BURTON. It was acquired in 1904, but under the act of 1902.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was all acquired under what is called the Spooner Act.

Mr. BURTON. That was passed in June, 1902, I believe.

Mr. FLETCHER. That act provided—

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to acquire, for and on behalf of the United States, at a cost not exceeding $40,000,000, the rights, privileges, franchises, concessions, grants of land, right of way, unfinished work, plants, and other property, real, personal, and mixed, of every name and nature, owned by the New Panama Canal Co., of France, on the Isthmus of Panama, and all its maps, plans, drawings, records on the Isthmus of Panama and in Paris, including all the capital stock, not less, however, than 68,863 shares of the Panama Railroad Co., owned by or held for the use of said canal company, provided a satisfactory title to all of said property can be obtained.

That is the act.

Mr. BURTON. I understand those shares of capital stock were included in the $40,000,000, were they not?

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. BURTON. They were not in addition to that?

Mr. FLETCHER. No, sir.

Mr. BURTON. The reference to that act suggests many interesting reminiscences of a historical nature relating to the act of 1902 and the act of 1899 that I feel tempted to digress, except that it would interfere with the sequence of my remarks.

Mr. FLETCHER. I apologize for mentioning it.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no apology is necessary. I remember in the House the conference report on the Spooner Act was adopted by an overwhelming majority, although a large majority of the Members of the House favored the Nicaraguan route.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. As the cost of operation has been referred to, it may be of interest at this time to insert the percentages of cost of operation since the Panama Railroad came under Government control. Of course, it is impossible to make comparisons which will be absolutely accurate in every instance without knowing the conditions that surround each transaction, but it may be depended upon without any question—at least, that is the history of the world—that in the case of a Government operation politics will enter in and the operating expenses will increase, while the rates which will be charged to the public will be decreased, preventing successful net results.
